Mr. KEIFER. This Congress first met under most extraordinary circumstances—within less than three weeks of the time it was entitled to meet under any possibility provided by the Constitution—and we then knew that the democratic party was in power in both branches of Congress, and we knew then as well as at any time since that a funding bill was important and of pressing necessity. The four months of the extra session passed. During that time the Committee on Ways and Means, distinguished because of the great men or the great democrats upon it, were considering the funding bill.

In the early days, if I recollect aright, of the first regular session of this Congress a bill was introduced providing for the funding of the national debt. Since that bill was printed and laid upon our tables we have had above ten months' continual session of this Congress. And now within forty-eight hours of the time we are to close this most memorable Congress a bill of a more than doubtful character has, amid the wreck of hopes and fortunes in some cases, passed, and instantly upon its being passed, before it could be engrossed or enrolled, and before the Speaker could sign his name to it, a distinguished democratic member of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. CARLISLE] arises in his place and introduces a bill which is from the first letter to the last a confession that the democratic party, in above ten months' session and consideration of a bill, could not pass one that was fit to go to the country. [Applause on the republican side.] It confesses and admits that it is vile, that it is evil, that it will do wrong and injustice, and that the whole country is to be financially ruined by it.

I do not allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to get the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] off the track by talking about national banks. I do not believe the national banks in the last week have acted with great prudence or with that courage which should have been displayed by their officers in meeting the great financial problem so unnecessarily forced upon this but recently prosperous country by the democratic party. I do not believe that at all. But it is not a question of national banks. It is a question of bread; it is a question of labor; it is a question of universal prosperity in this land. That is the question. It is a question of cheap money—cheap a few days ago—dear now, because the democratic party could not pass a law, as it now confesses through one of its distinguished leaders, but what would injure and ruin and unsettle all of the great financial interests of this country. It is a question of value of property; it is a question of labor; it is a question of keeping up and preserving our great and growing manufacturing interests of this country.

We want it understood now that with all the effort and with all the labor of the democratic majority of this Congress they must go out of it confessing that it is impossible for that party to control and regulate the great affairs of this nation wisely. We have some things to congratulate the country and the democratic party upon. We have witnessed some things this session which are valuable to be recorded and remembered. We have witnessed with pleasure the democratic party lay down that spirit that I dare not characterize and bring in here from the Appropriations Committee appropriation bills surrendering the things they said at one time they would have or they would have the nation's life. ["Oh!" "Oh!" from the democratic side.] They do not even go to that bill to which they clung for so long—the Army appropriation bill; they do not even go to that now. They even come here confessing that they have been wrong on that as well as on all other things which they have been obliged to surrender. They used to put a section into that bill prohibiting the use of the money appropriated for paying, equipping, and transporting troops to be used for keeping peace at the polls on election days; and they have surrendered that and laid it down in the presence of the verdict of the American people. [Derisive cries and laughter from the democratic side.]

Mr. TALBOTT. And still we had eight thousand majority on the popular vote.

Mr. KEIFER. You are mistaken. Garfield received a majority on the popular vote. I expected to hear these groans from the other side. I admit that they surrender and die hard, but the death comes all the same. Now let me, in bidding farewell to this subject, say that the democratic party, above all other parties that ever existed, is, if possible, to be congratulated more than the country for this verdict of the people.

But I want simply to re-enforce what I said at the beginning of my remarks. That is that we have this evening, in the closing hours of this Congress, had a proposition submitted to us boldly and openly confessing that on that subject about which we have been struggling and talking so long the democratic party has been obliged to offer a new bill, giving construction to the one just passed, which new bill is made up of amendments which were prepared to the original bill by the republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means. This extraordinary thing is done to perfect not a law, but to attempt to perfect that which is not for want of the approval of the President—a law which may never become a law. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has expired. The gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. CARLISLE. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] had been upon the stump before the people in the midst of an exciting political campaign I might have expected from him just such a speech as he has delivered here; but what relevancy it has to the question under consideration by the House I am unable to see.

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman will not consider—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. CARLISLE. The gentleman from Ohio has undertaken to put in my mouth confessions which I not only never made, but never dreamed of. I have not confessed that this measure about which we are now speaking, or the measure which we have just so happily concluded this evening, will ruin the business interests of the country or injure them in any respect.

Gentlemen on all sides will bear witness that during all the discussion and the excitement growing out of this long contest no word of denunciation has fallen from my lips against the national banks. I have been looking alone, if I know my own heart, to the highest and best interests of this great Government and masses of the American people; and I have considered the interests of the national banks simply as subordinate to them. If the gentleman considers it of more importance to preserve all the exclusive franchises and privileges of the national banks than to place the credit of this Government on the basis of the oldest and wealthiest countries in the world, then let him act accordingly and I will be the last to question his motives. I take this occasion, however, to say that the national banks, by their conduct during the last week, by the gross abuse of that great power which the bill passed this evening will take away from them I trust forever, have done more to arouse a spirit of just indignation in the bosoms of the American people than all the words of denunciation ever uttered by any democrat or greenbacker in this House or elsewhere. [Applause on the democratic side.] I warn them and their friends now that when they once satisfy the American people that all values may be destroyed and the whole business of the country deranged by the banks at their sovereign will and pleasure, the days of their existence are numbered. [Applause from democrats and greenbackers.]

Mr. GILLETTE. Good; good.

Mr. CARLISLE. Sir, I have taken the position from the beginning of this contest that this Congress would be faithless to the people it represents if it failed to apply a remedy for that great evil which constantly threatens the business interests of the country, so long as these banks hold the power to suddenly contract the currency as they have done during the last week. That remedy was the repeal, the simple and absolute repeal, of the fourth section of the act of June 20, 1874; and I heartily congratulate this House and the country that it has been at last accomplished, so far at least as the legislative department of the Government can do it.

Now, in reply to all that has been said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] as to what the democratic party has accomplished and what it has failed to accomplish during its supremacy in this Hall, I have only this to say: that in my opinion that party has had in view in all that it has done or omitted to do what its members conscientiously believed to be the best interests of the country; and I declare here that I will continue to act with it so long, and so long only, as I believe it to be really actuated by that spirit.

I have not made a political speech, or at least not a partisan speech, on the floor of this House during all my service here; I have given my earnest attention, so far as was possible, to what I honestly believed to be really the highest interests of the general public; and it ill becomes the gentleman from Ohio, simply because I and my associates have differed from gentlemen on the other side upon a great public measure like this, to say that our motives are not as pure and patriotic as theirs.

Mr. KEIFER. Who has said that? I did not intend to say it, if I did.

Mr. CARLISLE. That was the tenor of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. KEIFER. Not a word of it.

Mr. CARLISLE. That we have tried to strike down the Army, and that we have tried to strike a fatal blow at the business interests of the country.

Mr. KEIFER. I said that was the effect of this proposed legislation.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized on this side as the jewel of the democratic party in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. CARLISLE. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I have any time left, I want to make a response to the question propounded to me, or rather, which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] attempted to propound to me when I was last on the floor.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman permit me to propound the question?

Mr. CARLISLE. The gentleman propounded it——

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate on the motion to suspend the rules has expired. The Chair asks leave to lay before the House a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, so that he may sign the bills which have been enrolled.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. UPSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 5088) to authorize the registration of trade-marks and protect the same; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) to provide for the publication of the memorial addresses on Evarts W. Farr.

SUPPLEMENTAL FUNDING BILL.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate on the motion to suspend the rules having expired, the Chair will now submit the question. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has been read.

The motion was agreed to, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill (H. R. No. 7254) was passed.

ADJOURNMENT TILL THURSDAY.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER. I move that the House now take a recess until ten o'clock on Thursday morning.

Mr. CLYMER. I move the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Before submitting the question on the motion to adjourn, the Chair desires, if there be no objection, to lay before the House some executive communications.

There was no objection.

WASHINGTON GASLIGHT COMPANY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Washington Gaslight Company in answer to a resolution of the House of February 10, 1881; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting his annual report of contingent expenses, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting an inventory of public property in his possession, &c.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PRODUCTION OF PRECIOUS METALS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report of the Director of the Mint upon the statistics of the production of the precious metals in the United States; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting papers in the New Mexico private land claim No. 120, in the name of José Dominguez; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting papers in the Louisiana private land claim No. 15, class 1, of John C. Cofield; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. PHELPS, Mr. GILLETTE, and Mr. DE LA MATYR to have printed in the RECORD remarks on the funding bill. [See Appendix.]

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave for withdrawal of papers was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. LADD, papers on the files of the Committee on Pensions in the case of Zenos Herrick, a soldier in the war of 1812.

To Mr. BOYD, papers in relation to the claim of George A. Wilson; no adverse report.

To Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, papers in the case of James Green; no adverse report.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

On motion of Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, Report No. 332, third session Forty-sixth Congress, submitted by him February 22, 1881, from the Committee on Military Affairs, upon lands granted to the Willamette Valley and Cascade Mountain Wagon-road Company; was ordered to be printed, as corrected by him, with additional matter.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CLYMER, that the House adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at six o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned till Thursday.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows, viz:

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 2, 1881.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. COKE presented the credentials of SAM. BELL MAXEY, chosen by the Legislature of Texas a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1881; which were read and ordered to be filed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to section 8 of the act of July 22, 1854, plats and papers in sundry private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PLUMB presented the memorial of D. C. Hallock, and other citizens of Goode, Kansas, soldiers in the late war, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of granting the Fort Hays military reserve to the State of Kansas for school purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, favoring an appropriation for the payment of what are known as Indian depredation claims; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, relative to the taxing of railroad lands; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, which was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

House concurrent resolution No. 29, in relation to Federal legislation for the protection of stock from disease.

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives requested to make all reasonable efforts to secure Federal legislation for the protection of stock from the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia and the disease known as Texas or Spanish fever.

Resolved further, That the secretary of state be instructed to transmit a copy of this resolution to each of our delegation in Congress.

Adopted by the house February 7, 1881.

W. W. WALTON,
Chief Clerk.

Concurred in by the senate February 12, 1881.

HENRY BRANDLEY,
Secretary.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of James F. Gadsden, postmaster at Rantowles, South Carolina, praying for relief from the obligation of making good a loss to the Government caused by a robbery of the post-office at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. VOORHEES presented the petition of F. Mansfield, of Saint Louis, Missouri, praying for the repeal of the internal-revenue tax on friction matches; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Daniel C. Ashby and 119 others, citizens of Indiana, soldiers in the late war, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1522) for the relief of W. P. Burwell, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6860) for the relief of William H. Davis, have duly considered the same, and instruct me to report it favorably without amendment, and recommend the passage of the bill as it came from the House. A bill nearly similar to this passed the Senate and went to the House. It was not concurred in, and this form of bill was sent back.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. GROOME, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Wiley H. Brown, of Alabama, praying that interest on a certain judgment be refunded, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1129) for the relief of certain laborers employed upon Government works, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1625) for the relief of Charles G. Perry, of Indiana, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6478) for the relief of Levi Price, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOAR. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims to report favorably the bill (H. R. No. 4438) for the relief of William Redus. I desire that the bill be placed upon the Calendar without printing the report, as the report merely adopts the House report, and the sending of the papers to the Printer would make it impossible to take up the bill during the present session. I ask that the report be read, so that it may go into the RECORD. It is only a few lines.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4438) for the relief of William Redus, having considered the same, recommend its passage for the reasons set forth in the House report, which is submitted herewith.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2183) for the relief of George W. Wicks & Co., of Louisville, Kentucky, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3782) for the relief of John H. Shugart and Robert F. Shugart, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON EVARTS W. FARR.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) to provide for the publication of the memorial addresses on Evarts W. Farr, to report it without amendment, and ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It provides that there be printed 12,000 copies of the memorial addresses delivered in the Senate and House of Representatives upon the life and character of Hon. Evarts W. Farr, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire, together with a portrait of the deceased; 9,000 copies thereof for the use of the House of Representatives and 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO NORTH AMERICAN ETHNOLOGY.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 6,000 copies each of volumes 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 of the Contributions to North American Ethnology, uniform with the preceding volumes of the series, and with the necessary illustrations; 3,030 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 for the use of the Senate, and 1,970 for distribution by the Bureau of Ethnology.

MUSEUM BUILDING.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported adversely thereon, and the committee were discharged from its further consideration:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That permission is granted to the Washington Light Infantry Corps of the District of Columbia to use the Museum building on Monday evening, the 7th of March, 1881, provided that no expense shall be thereby incurred to the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed at this time to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6033) to pay Hiram Johnson and other persons herein named the several sums of money herein specified, being the surplus of a military assessment paid by them and accounted for to the United States in excess of the amount required for the indemnity for which it was levied and collected.

Mr. BECK. I should like to ask whether the bill is likely to lead to any debate. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to call up the sundry civil bill, a long and difficult bill, which must reach the House to-day; and unless we can begin with it at an early hour this morning it will be impossible for the House to consider it and a conference committee consider it in time for it to reach the President and become a law.

Mr. HARRIS. It is impossible for me to say whether the bill will or will not lead to debate; I think very little, if any; but if the Senate shall take it up and proceed to its consideration it shall not stand in the way of the Committee on Appropriations whenever they desire the right of way for an appropriation bill.

Mr. BECK. I will take the chances for a little while.

Mr. INGALLS. I am very confident that the bill which the Senator from Tennessee wishes to have considered will require explanation and will probably lead to discussion. I suggest to him that in view of the importance of the sundry civil appropriation bill he allow this bill to be taken up and informally laid aside, reserving its place, so that after that bill shall be disposed of it may be considered.

Mr. HARRIS. All that I desire is that the bill shall be taken up, so that whenever we have time to consider it it may be proceeded with. It shall not stand in the way of the sundry civil bill or any other general appropriation bill one moment.

Mr. EATON. I shall object to the bill being taken up if my friend from Tennessee proposes it shall take the place of the bill which really has the right of way here at half past one o'clock.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Connecticut will allow me to explain. The bill that he refers to, and of which he has charge, being the unfinished business after the morning hour, it cannot come up within the morning hour except by postponing the pending orders to take it up.

Mr. EATON. I understand that, and I did not intend to press it in the morning hour.

Mr. HARRIS. Hence if the bill I referred to is taken up it will not interfere with the Senator's bill at all.

Mr. McMILLAN. The bill to which the Senator from Tennessee refers is one which no doubt will lead to very considerable discussion. Under the rule which has been adopted by the Senate we are to proceed to the consideration of House bills upon the Calendar. The first bill, as I understand it, which would now regularly come up under that order is the bill (H. R. No. 4412) to regulate practice in suits brought to recover damages for infringement of patent. That bill has been considered. I think it retains its place upon the Calendar now. It is a bill in which great interest is felt by many of the Senators, and especially does it interest the constituents which I have the honor in part to represent here.

Mr. HOAR. My friend is wrong about that. The patent bill was amended and went over under an objection.

Mr. McMILLAN. It went to the foot of the Calendar. We have gone through the Calendar and now reach the patent bill again in its regular order.

Mr. HOAR. I do not so understand it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understand that to be the order of business. Therefore, for the purpose of disposing of the patent bill in which we feel an interest, I shall be compelled to interpose an objection.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator surely seems to be greatly in error about that.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the pending order be postponed in order that I may then move to proceed to the consideration of the bill that I have indicated.

Mr. McMILLAN. If I am correct in regard to the order of business I shall interpose an objection; otherwise I should not feel inclined to insist upon it; but I think I am right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Minnesota on either occasion, on account of the confusion in the Chamber. The regular order is the consideration of the Calendar of House bills. The Senator from Tennessee moves that that order be postponed, indicating his purpose if that motion prevails to move the consideration of the bill specified by him.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understood the Senator to ask for unanimous consent at the time I had the floor before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He did at that time.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the bill that the Senator from Tennessee proposes to take up?

Mr. HARRIS. It is House bill No. 6033 for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others.

Mr. McMILLAN. I desire to know the position of House bill No. 4412 upon the Calendar at this time. The bill was under consideration on a former day. It was objected to, and under the rule went to the foot of the Calendar, as I understand. We have since that gone through with all the House bills upon the Calendar that were unobjected to, and we now resume the consideration of the House bills that have previously gone to the foot of the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. New bills have since been placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. How does my friend from Minnesota get at the idea that the bill goes to the foot of the Calendar? If he will permit me to state the point as I understand it under the three rules printed at the head of the Calendar, which all are in force though each of them supplements the other, there is a provision for the consideration of the Calendar; and "bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order." The first two resolutions expressly provide that; and the last one says the "House bills which have been favorably reported," shall be considered "subject to the rules governing the business of the morning hour;" and bills not objected to are "to be taken up in their order." When a bill is reached on the Calendar and objected to, it is not simply the result of that objection that the bill goes to the foot of the list of bills in that class; it simply ceases to be one of the bills to which the rule applies and remains in its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has no doubt of that.

Mr. HOAR. We go on and call from the Calendar the House bills that have been favorably reported; and when we get through that class then the Calendar stands. Now my friend from Minnesota understands that if a House bill favorably reported by a Senate committee is objected to it simply goes to the foot of the list of House bills so favoraby reported, and when you have got through all others of that class you take that bill up, though it is in the middle of the Calendar. I do not so understand it. I understand that you take up the first bill on the Calendar when you reach the Calendar again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair agrees with the Senator fully; he has indicated no other ruling.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that the Chair has, but it was to my friend from Minnesota I was replying.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then I ask in what position such a bill stands upon the Calendar?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A bill which has once been called?

Mr. McMILLAN. A bill which has once been called and passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Several bills have been placed on the Calendar since. When the Calendar shall have been called through under the special rule introduced on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, when that rule shall have spent its force, then the Anthony rule will attach to the Calendar, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then the first case on the Calendar this morning is the bill to which I have referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar has not yet been called through under the Harris rule.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am asking the Chair, however, for information, whether the bill will be displaced by the motion of the Senator from Tennessee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will not. It is not affected in any way by it. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to postpone the pending order.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 29.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let us have the yeas and nays upon this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 37, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—37.

Bailey,	Eaton,	Kernan,	Thurman,
Bayard,	Farley,	Lamar,	Vance,
Beck,	Garland,	McPherson,	Vest,
Brown,	Groome,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker,
Call,	Harris,	Pendleton,	Wallace,
Cockrell,	Hereford,	Pugh,	Whyte.
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Randolph,
Conkling,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,

NAYS—19.

Anthony,	Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,
Blair,	Ferry,	Logan,	Saunders,
Booth,	Hamlin,	Morrill,	Teller,
Burnside,	Hoar,	Platt,	Windom.
Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Plumb,

ABSENT—19.

Allison,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,
Baldwin,	Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Sharon,
Blaine,	Grover,	McDonald,	Williams,
Bruce,	Hill of Colorado,	McMillan,	Withers.
Cameron of Wis.,	Johnston,	Paddock,

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 6033.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 6033) to pay Hiram Johnson and other persons herein named the several sums of money herein specified, being the surplus of a military assessment paid by them and accounted for to the United States in excess of the amount required for the indemnity for which it was levied and collected.

Mr. HOAR. Let us hear the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts calls for the reading of the report.

Mr. BECK. Before that is done I ask that the bill may be laid aside informally, so that we may proceed with the sundry civil bill.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection if by unanimous consent it can be laid aside informally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent. Shall this bill be laid aside informally and without prejudice in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the sundry civil bill?

Mr. HOAR. I think I must object. I think that bill is not entitled to take precedence of the great public questions which are to be left undecided when we adjourn. We ought not to lay aside all the things on the Calendar to correct the proceedings of a military court during the war.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not interpose an objection that will force me to let the bill go over, when all that I ask is to reach the judgment of the Senate as to the merits of the bill.

I am quite satisfied that the Senator from Massachusetts and every Senator can arrive at a conclusion as to the merit or want of merit of this bill in thirty minutes' time if he will endeavor to do so. I do not desire any hot haste or hurry. The bill has been on the Calendar since last summer, and I feel that I am entitled to ask at the hands of the Senate the expression of its judgment as to the merits of the bill. Satisfied as I am that the claim is in every way meritorious, I feel bound to press it; but I cannot stand in the way of the sundry civil bill, no matter at what sacrifice to the interest of these parties or to my desire in respect of getting a vote on the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the seats of one-third of the Supreme Court of the United States are vacant, and the illness of a single judge deprives that court of a quorum; yet the Senator from Tennessee desires that a Congress which has not time to deal with that grave question shall refrain from considering the public want in that particular, and the public want in a hundred other matters of equal dignity and importance, to retry the proceedings of a court which sat during the war, and which assessed upon the sympathizers with certain wrong-doers $20 or $30 a piece too much. Whether the bill ought to pass or not, this is a question not of merits, but of comparative merits. For one it does not seem to me that we should agree that that is the most pressing thing which the American people need to have done by their Congress during these last few days. That is the reason I object.

Mr. HARRIS. I am satisfied if the Senator from Massachusetts understood the facts of this case as well as I do, he would not assume that I seek to set aside the judgment of a court, and he would not, either, object to the unanimous consent to let the bill be informally laid aside. Does the Senator object?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. Then trusting to the Senate to take the bill up at the first moment that it can be done without antagonizing an appropriation bill, I am bound to let it go over, because I cannot stand in the way of the consideration of the sundry civil bill when the Committee on Appropriations demand the right of way; but I shall appeal to the Senate to take up the bill again and proceed with its consideration at the very first moment that it does not antagonize an appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky asks the Senate now to proceed with the consideration of the sundry civil bill, to which the Chair hears no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 2769) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage the establishment of public marine schools," approved June 20, 1874, so as to extend it to the ports of Wilmington, Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, New Orleans, Baton Rouge, and Galveston; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4411) to establish an additional land district in the State of Kansas.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 709) for the relief of William S. Burgess and others;

A bill (H. R. No. 1542) for the relief of Charles Clinton, of New Orleans, late assistant treasurer at New Orleans;

A bill (H. R. No. 2503) for the relief of John H. W. Riley, of California;

A bill (H. R. No. 3451) for the relief of George W. Brower;

A bill (H. R. No. 3785) appropriating money for the erection of a penitentiary in the Territory of Dakota;

A bill (H. R. No. 4261) for the relief of Henry B. Eastman;

A bill (H. R. No. 4590) to provide for the sale of certain property owned by the United States in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 4663) to admit free of duty one of the bells of Saint Michael's chimes, Charleston, South Carolina, which has been sent to England to be recast;

A bill (H. R. No. 5389) for the relief of Samuel Harper;

A bill (H. R. No. 5532) establishing a life-saving station at Louisville, Kentucky;

A bill (H. R. No. 6493) to provide for the construction of a public building at Jackson, in the State of Mississippi;

A bill (H. R. No. 1320) for the relief of citizens of Montana who served with the United States troops in the war with the Nez Percés, and for the relief of the heirs of such as were killed in such service;

A bill (H. R. No. 1359) for the relief of Louis P. di Cesnola, late consul at Cyprus;

A bill (H. R. No. 2705) for the relief of Joseph Clymer, of Texas;

A bill (H. R. No. 4413) for the relief of J. Scott Payne;

A bill (H. R. No. 4434) for the relief of Mrs. Martha Bridges, of Bartow County, Georgia;

A bill (H. R. No. 4607) for the relief of Passed Assistant Engineer Absalom Kirby, of the Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 5097) appropriating money towards the expenses to be incurred in the centennial celebration of the battle on Groton Heights, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 5629) to graduate the price and dispose of the residue of the Osage Indian trust and diminished reserve lands lying east of the sixth principal meridian in Kansas; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 373) relative to printing the Agricultural Report for the year 1880.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator from Kentucky to give way to me for just a moment. A few days ago the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] introduced a joint resolution relating to the Government employés in the District of Columbia. I have made inquiries of the different Departments, and the substance of the information derived is contained on a sheet which I have here. Without detaining the Senate, I ask that this sheet go in the RECORD, so that when the resolution is called up it may be referred to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the joint resolution reported back from the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Committee on Appropriations having been so much engaged lately have not had time to consider it. I as chairman have looked it over and believe it is meritorious; but I am not instructed by the committee to report it back as an individual.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Was it once referred to the committee?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It was.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then it will remain in committee unless reported back by a majority action. The paper referred to will be printed in the RECORD, unless objection be made.

The statement presented by Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, is as follows:

War Department: Only effect—Per diem employés on 4th of March will probably be 103, and on 30th day of May 256. No rate of pay given.

Treasury Department: Secretary of the Treasury—The passage of the bill would not affect persons employed in that Department.

Navy Department: Secretary of the Navy says number of employés varies, but at present time about 725. No rate of pay given.

Interior Department: Per diem pay of employés in month of February, (average,) $142.50.

Public Printer: Says the two holidays would cost $9,343.24.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, so that it may be put on its passage. No member of the committee will oppose that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield for that purpose?

Mr. BECK. I do not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The sundry civil bill is before the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read in course and for amendment as the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations are reached.

Mr. BECK. I was just about to ask that. Perhaps I had best call the attention of Senators to the amendments, and I may save some little time by doing so now. I have had a statement made up by the clerk of the committee, showing the following facts:

Amount of estimates for 1882	$23,751,182 59
Amount of appropriations for 1881	22,515,428 91
Amount of bill as passed the House	20,720,405 42
Net amount added by the Senate committee	2,119,894 51
Total as reported to Senate	22,840,299 93
The bill as reported is less than estimate	910,882 66
The bill as reported exceeds account for 1881	324,871 02

The additions of the Senate are made up of a number of items, some of them quite large, for uses of the public.

The items of increase and reduction are as follows:

Total increase	2,125,894 51
Reductions:
For certain expenses of contested elections	6,000 00
Net increase	2,119,894 51

When the item appropriating $200,000 for preparing granite for the west and center wings of the State, War, and Navy building comes up, I will state the reasons for that. I am asked to state the reasons now and may as well do so. The $480,000 now in the bill as it came from the House will finish the north front of the building leaving the west front unfinished. Unless the superintendent is allowed to have the money now to go on with the cutting and preparation of the granite we shall not be able to give him anything more until May or June, 1882, when the season will be so far advanced that he can do very little in the way of preparing the granite for the west wing. He tells us that the great delay is caused by the preparation of the granite, that one man can lay in the wall in one day as much granite as five hundred men can cut and prepare. It requires two hundred and fifty men even on the plain work of the Washington Monument to prepare as much granite as one man can put in place in the wall. It was an amazing statement to us; but the engineer officer went over it all and showed how much one man could lay and how much one man could cut and showed that it was absolutely true. So, unless he is allowed to obtain his granite and prepare it now, we shall have a delay of a year or two, and the rents we are now paying for other buildings will have to go on.

It is therefore in the interest of economy that we should give him $200,000 additional to obtain granite to be used in that work as soon as he can prepare it. He is doing the work very economically. He has built the north front of the building corresponding in every regard with the south front quite as well and a little better and somewhat larger for a million and a half less money than the south wing cost. We found therefore that he was a man we could trust with the economical management of affairs and we ought to give him what he asked.

It was made apparent to us also that there was great necessity for the bill which passed the Senate some time ago providing for the erection of a hall of records. It ought to be erected at once. Quartermaster-General Meigs and other officers from the Treasury and other Departments came before us and assured us that in the present condition of things the records of this Government were wholly unsafe unless the building be erected at once. The Senate unanimously passed the bill for that erection. It is doubtful whether it can be reached in the House. There ought to be no delay about it and therefore we have provided $200,000 for the erection of that building. It is to be a hall of records for all the Departments with separate compartments for each. The plan described by the Quartermaster-General was that each Department will have a separate place by itself so that the burning of one part even would not affect the others; and it is to be made fire-proof, if it can be done.

We found that the Pension Office was paying enormous rents and having very few conveniences, and we made a proposition to the Senate in the form of an amendment to appropriate $250,000 under direction of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior and the Quartermaster-General for the erection of a building for the accommodation of that bureau. We think that to erect it will make the cost to us $8,000 or $9,000 a year, or not over $10,000, while we are now paying $20,000, and perhaps $24,000, for very insufficient accommodations. The rent we are now paying in the District, according to my recollection, is $166,000; and it is true economy, wherever we can economically put up buildings of our own and occupy them ourselves instead of paying the enormous rents we are paying for the accommodations we now receive, with the danger of fire to our records everywhere unless they are in fire-proof buildings. These are the items which swell up the bill so largely.

Then there is $75,000 for the navy-yard at Pensacola, Florida, the only navy-yard on the Gulf. The condition of affairs there was complained of a good deal by one of the gentlemen from Florida, and we provided for it.

We inserted in this bill a provision already agreed to by the Senate, appropriating $175,000 to provide a vessel, &c., for the search of the steamer Jeannette. That has passed the Senate in a separate bill which has gone to the House, but perhaps cannot be reached there. We have put it as an amendment to this bill, it being properly sent to us by the committee in charge of it.

There are various items for barracks and quarters for the Marine Corps at the Naval Academy at Annapolis. The present buildings are in danger of being washed away; they are supported by props. So with the barracks at Norfolk. They are in such condition that the men cannot live in them with any comfort. These things are recommended, and we think they deserve attention.

Under a contract laid before us we agreed to appropriate $33,744.78 for the improvement of Hot Springs Creek and reservation in Arkansas, property of our own, to keep it from being washed away.

We had to insert $55,000 more for the support of the Government Insane Hospital, because of the change made in the District of Columbia appropriation bill when it was before the Senate.

One item we have inserted which, when first presented, did strike us as remarkable, and that is the appropriation of $175,000 for the purchase of land from the Creek Nation for the Seminoles. I will not explain that now; but when we reach it the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] or myself will. The United States purchased a large tract of land from the Creeks west of a certain line, and they found it to their interest to move the Seminoles out of their territory and put them on a portion of the land purchased of the Creeks. By mistake they were placed east of the line, where they have made their improvements, and they have been there for years, the Creeks seeking to drive them away and the Seminoles insisting on staying. In 1873 we passed a law directing the Secretary of the Interior to settle that matter, and to pay whatever was necessary in order to adjust it. It was finally brought into court. To do justice to these people $175,000 is required, and we have to make this provision for them to carry out the existing law and an order we ourselves had given to the Secretary of the Interior.

Besides these, the $150,000 demanded for the French and American claims commission constitute all increases with the exception of some small items which can be explained when they are reached.

I think it is safe to say that while we have not had much time to consider this important bill because it did not reach us until Monday, though we had begun upon it informally some days before, and while we have been pressed with amendments and applications from the Departments, and by a great many Senators and Representatives with very important questions, many of which perhaps we did not consider as fully as we would have done if we had had more time, we have endeavored to present the bill, as far as possible, free from practical objection in the interest of the public service.

That is all the statement I desire to make at present.

I do not know whether the order has been made, but if not I desire to ask that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be acted upon as they are reached in order in the reading of the bill, and that the amendments of the committee be acted upon before any other amendments are received.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The Senate hears the request of the Senator from Kentucky in charge of the sundry civil bill that the amendments be acted upon as they are reached in order in the reading of the bill and that the amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations be first acted upon before any amendments are entertained from any Senator. If there be no objection that will be the order. The bill will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for the Treasury Department, under the head of "public buildings," after line 45, to insert:

Barge-office building, New York, New York: For completion of building, $100,000.

Mr. BECK. I desire to have inserted in the RECORD a short letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the importance of this barge office at New York. The officer of the Government in charge of it also appeared before us, and showed us how important it was. The object in having it placed in the RECORD, even though there is no objection to the amendment, is that the gentlemen of the House may see it, as time is very important.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
February 23, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to the fact that the item of $100,000, included in the estimate for the ensuing fiscal year, for the completion of the United States barge office, is omitted from the "sundry civil bill" now before the House of Representatives.

The attention of Congress was, at the last session, called to the necessity for a further appropriation for this building, and the reasons for the increased cost above the original estimate are fully set forth in the annual report of the Supervising Architect, as follows:

"In the preparation for the foundation, upon removal of a portion of the sea-wall, which it was intended to renew, a renewal of the entire wall was found necessary, compelling the Department to construct more than double the quantity of sea-wall contemplated by the original contract. The building of this additional wall and the advance of the price of iron since the estimate of the cost was made, renders it impracticable to complete the building within the estimate originally submitted."

The foundations of the building are all completed, a large portion of the superstructure erected, and other portions of the work under contracts. The building is needed for the transaction of Government business, and should be completed at the earliest practicable date. The failure of Congress to make an appropriation at the present session will necessitate the issuing of immediate orders for the suspension of work, and I most earnestly recommend that the amount, namely, $100,000, asked in the regular estimates be appropriated.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary.

Hon. HENRY G. DAVIS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 47, to insert:

Assay office, New York, New York: To provide increased accommodations, by the addition of a mansard story, on the Wall street front of the building, and to make necessary alterations and repairs, $30,000.

Mr. BECK. I have a letter from the Director of the Mint as to this, which I shall place in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF THE MINT,
Washington, D. C., February 15, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to the insufficiency of the rooms in the United States assay office at New York for the business required to be transmitted there, approximating $75,000,000 per annum, and the imperative necessity of increasing the facilities by a few alterations and the addition of a mansard story on the Wall street front of the building for the accommodation of the assayer's department. The alterations necessary and the mansard story it is estimated will cost $30,000, and I earnestly recommend that an appropriation of that amount be procured from Congress.

Very respectfully,

HORATIO C. BURCHARD,
Director.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment was, after "therewith," in line 62, to strike out the following proviso:

And be it further provided, That there be expended out of the amount herein appropriated a sum sufficient for the completion and fitting up of as many of the rooms of said building as will accommodate the post-office of said city.

So that the clause will read:

Post-office and court-house, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: For continuation of building, $350,000: Provided, That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of the amount hereby appropriated, shall be expended in completing immediately and fitting up for use the rooms in said building intended for occupancy by the United States courts and the officers connected therewith.

Mr. BECK. The reason for striking that out is that the architect of the building said if the post-office rooms were placed there now he could not go on with his work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "dollars," in line 82, to insert:

Provided, That the roof of said building shall be iron-framed and fire-proof, and that the limit of cost for the entire building be extended $20,000 to cover increased cost therefor.

So as to make the clause read:

Court-house and post-office, Topeka, Kansas: For continuation of building, $90,000: Provided, That the roof of said building shall be iron-framed and fire-proof, and that the limit of cost for the entire building be extended $20,000 to cover increased cost therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 94, after the word "dollars," in the clause appropriating $100,000 for the continuation of the custom-house and courthouse building at Toledo, Ohio, to insert:

Provided, That the total cost of the building, with the additional land authorized to be purchased, in the city of Toledo, Ohio, shall not exceed the sum of $400,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sell the public building and other structures standing on the lots now owned by the United States as a building site in the said city, and apply the fund realized from such sale to the construction of the new building authorized to be erected; and the amount so applied shall be deducted from the sum limited herein to be expended on this improvement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "light-houses and fog-signals," after the word "appropriation," in line 136, to insert "of $7,000;" so as to make the clause read:

Stamford Harbor light-station, Connecticut: For completing the light-house in Stamford Harbor, Connecticut, the appropriation of $7,000 made by the act of June 16, 1880, for the establishment of a light on Forked Rock, Stamford Harbor, Connecticut, being hereby made available for establishing a light on such point in Stamford Harbor as the Light-House Board may select, $23,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 152, to insert:

Point Conception light-station, California: For rebuilding station and purchasing land for site of light-house at Point Conception, California, $40,000, of which sum not exceeding $10,000 shall be used for purchase of the site; and no portion of the residue of said appropriation shall be expended until the title to the said site is vested in the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after "United States," in line 235, to insert "including a station at the Falls of the Ohio River, near Louisville, Kentucky;" and in line 237, after "twenty," to insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

Establishing life-saving stations:

For establishing new life-saving stations and life-boat stations on the sea and lake coasts of the United States, including a station at the Falls of the Ohio River, near Louisville, Kentucky, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the head of "revenue-cutter service," after line 254, to insert:

Constructing a revenue-steamer: For construction of a revenue-steamer for duty on the southern coast of the United States, $75,000.

Mr. BECK. In connection with that I desire to place on record a letter from Captain Merryman, in command of the revenue marine, showing the absolute necessity for one certainly, and he thought two vessels. I send it to the Reporter to be inserted.

The letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES REVENUE MARINE, TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 1, 1881.

SENATOR: Referring to our conversation on Saturday, you will find the item for two new steamers for the revenue-cutter service on page 163 of the Book of Estimates, fiscal year 1882. The sum required is $150,000, and was not provided for by the House Committee on Appropriations in the sundry civil bill, although recommended in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the necessity for the vessels explained in the appendix to Book of Estimates, page 220.

As the House committee did not question the necessity for the appropriation when the chief of the revenue marine division was before it to explain the estimates for the service in general, it was supposed the item would appear in the sundry civil bill.

We have but three able vessels on the southern coast. The others are small side-wheel steamers, originally built for harbor and river service in the merchant marine. The vessels to supply the southern coast at the close of the war were purchased when the expenses of the service were defrayed from the receipts of customs indiscriminately and without special appropriation by Congress. They have been replaced gradually with abler and more economical vessels as appropriations were made for the purpose. The two which it is now desired to replace are quite unfit for service, and it is indispensable for the proper protection of the revenue that new ones should take their places.

The sketch-map I gave you will show the extent of coast-line to be protected.

The two old steamers are stationed at Pensacola and Bay Saint Louis, respectively.

Very respectfully,

J. H. MERRYMAN,
Captain United States Revenue Marine.

Hon. JAMES B. BECK, United States Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment was, under the head of "Engraving and Printing," in line 268, after the word "materials," to strike out "including paper;" and in line 274, after the word "destroyed," to strike out "three hundred and fifty" and insert "four hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Engraving and printing:

For labor and expenses of engraving and printing, namely: For labor, (by the day, piece, or contract,) including labor of workmen skilled in engraving, transferring, plate-printing, and other specialties necessary for carrying on the work of engraving and printing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, the pay for such labor to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury at rates not exceeding the rates usually paid for such work; and for other expenses of engraving and printing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States; for materials required in the work of engraving and printing; for purchase of engravers' tools, dies, rolls, and plates, and for machinery and repairs of same; and for expenses of operating macerating machines for the destruction of the United States notes, bonds, national-bank notes, and other obligations of the United States authorized to be destroyed, $400,000.

Mr. BECK. I send to the Reporter to place in the RECORD in that connection a letter from Colonel Irish, Superintendent of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING,
March 1, 1881.

SIR: In compliance with the suggestions made by you at our conference yesterday I have the honor to submit the following relative to the item in the sundry civil appropriation bill for labor and expenses of engraving and printing United States notes and other securities:

There will be required 8,134,500 sheets of United States notes, silver certificates, and registered bonds to meet the demands of business during the fiscal year 1882. To execute this work will require, exclusive of the cost of paper, $425,000, and if any less money be appropriated it will make a corresponding reduction in the amount of notes, certificates, and registered bonds which can be delivered. If the appropriation for the bureau as passed the House giving it $350,000, and requiring that the supply of distinctive paper be purchased therefrom, be concurred in by the Senate, the deliveries of United States notes will stop before the 1st of April, 1882, leaving three months in which none can be furnished to the United States Treasurer. And the peculiar character of the work of preparing and printing these notes will not permit the work to be taken up after having once stopped without a delay of at least sixty days before the deliveries can commence again. It requires the constant production of a certain amount of notes day by day to meet the regular demands of business, and it is likely to produce serious difficulties in the business transactions of the country if this should be interrupted for a single day. The following facts will show that there has been for months past a gradual decrease in the reserve held by the United States Treasurer:

On the 16th of October, 1880, the date at which the reserve reached its highest point during this present fiscal year, there were on hand the following amounts:

Denomination.	Amount.
Ones, 1880	$3, 062, 774
Twos, 1880	2, 936, 000
Fives, 1880	5, 380, 000
Tens, 1880	6, 600, 000
Twenties, 1878	9, 200, 000
Twenties, 1880	320, 000
Fifties, 1878	5, 500, 000
One-hundreds, 1878	8, 648, 000
Five-hundreds, 1878	9, 500, 000
One-thousands, 1878	16, 200, 000
Five-thousands, 1878	14, 995, 000
Ten-thousands, 1878	34, 990, 000
Total	117, 271, 774

As soon as the demand for United States notes for the fall business was made on the Treasurer's Office the reserve began to decrease rapidly, as will be seen from the following table:

Statement of weekly decrease of the reserve fund.

Week ending—	Amount.
October 30, 1880	$1, 001, 600
November 13, 1880	362, 600
November 20, 1880	300, 524
November 27, 1880	881, 300
December 4, 1880	625, 900
December 11, 1880	735, 759
December 18, 1880	1, 010, 400
December 30, 1880	1, 579, 811
January 8, 1881	311, 200
January 15, 1881	555, 725
January 22, 1881	698, 449
	8, 063, 267
In the week ending November 6, there was an increase of	11, 100
Leaving a net decrease of	8, 052, 167

And the reserve has been reduced to the point indicated in the following statement from the Treasurer's Office, when the last comparative statement was made:

Statement from the Treasurer's Office of the balance in reserve vault of legal-tender notes, January 22, 1881.

Denomination.	Amount.
Ones, 1880	$1, 818, 507
Twos, 1880	1, 816, 000
Fives, 1880	4, 220, 000
Tens, 1880	5, 240, 000
Twenties, 1880	320, 000
Twenties, 1878	7, 680, 000
Fifties, 1878	5, 200, 000
One-hundreds, 1878	7, 884, 900
Five-hundreds, 1878	9, 400, 000
One-thousands, 1878	16, 200, 000
Five-thousands, 1878	14, 995, 000
Ten-thousands, 1878	34, 990, 000
Total	109, 764, 407

The following extract from a letter written by the Treasurer of the United States to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated September 24, 1879, will show how far the reserve fund in his hands has fallen below the point at which he deems it absolutely necessary it should be maintained:

"I wish to renew my recommendation that the reserve fund of this office be put in a condition to supply the demands of any denomination of notes that it may be called upon to furnish. In order to do this it will be necessary that there be at all times therein $10,000,000 each of fives, tens, and twenties, and $5,000,000 each of ones and twos."

The following table will make this contrast more readily perceptible:

Denomination.	Amount demanded by United States Treasurer.	Amount in reserve.
Ones	$5, 000, 000	$1, 818, 507
Twos	5, 000, 000	1, 816, 000
Fives	10, 000, 000	4, 220, 000
Tens	10, 000, 000	5, 240, 000
Twenties	10, 000, 000	8, 000, 000

Owing to the fact that Congress last year failed to appropriate the amount of money asked for to print these notes and that the demand for silver certificates under the act of February 28, 1878, increased very largely over the estimate made by the Treasurer, (his estimate having been but for 50,000 sheets, and his requisitions 828,000 sheets,) the reserve will continue to decrease during the remainder of this year; and it will readily be seen that, the reserve having been practically exhausted, there will be no recourse except to suspend the delivery and redemption of United States notes as soon as the amount of money appropriated by Congress shall have been expended. This, as indicated above, will be about the 1st of April, 1882, should no greater amount than $350,000 be appropriated for the work.

Upon the other point which I had the honor to urge upon you—that is, the separation of the appropriation for the purchase of distinctive paper from that for labor and expenses of engraving and printing—I beg to say that there will be embarrassment so long as the combining of these appropriations shall be insisted upon by Congress. It has been the aim of the present administration to entirely separate all matters pertaining to the purchase, examination, and custody of the distinctive paper, so that a complete and effectual check might be had thereby upon the bureau charged with the printing of the notes, securities, and other values; that the chief of this bureau could not, by any means other than those prescribed, obtain possession of a particle of this paper. This will not be fully accomplished as long as he shall have any authority over the appropriation from which this paper is purchased, and the employés upon it paid therefrom.

In conclusion, I have the honor to most earnestly urge that the full amount asked for in the estimates approved and submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury be appropriated, as this matter has received special and careful consideration in his office on account of the embarrassments experienced this year in filling the requisitions of the Treasurer for United States notes and silver-certificates. The amounts asked for are: for labor, &c., (Book of Estimates, page 163,) $425,000; for distinctive paper, (page 167,) $81,000.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. H. IRISH,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. H. G. DAVIS,
Chairman, &c., United States Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 314, after the word "Rivers," to insert "and at the mouth of Red River;" so as to make the clause read:

Lighting and buoyage: For maintenance of lights and buoys on the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers, and at the mouth of Red River, $140,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Coast and Geodetic Survey," after the word "dollars," in line 336, to insert "and of this sum $8,000 shall be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read:

Coast and Geodetic Survey:

Survey of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, eastern division: For every purpose and object necessary for and incident to the continuation of the survey of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts of the United States, the Mississippi and other rivers, to the head of either tidal influence or ship navigation; soundings, deep-sea temperatures, dredgings, and current-observations along the above-named coasts, in the Gulf of Mexico, and the Gulf Stream, including its entrance into the Gulf, its course through the Caribbean and into and around the Sargasso Sea; the triangulation toward the western coast, and furnishing points for State surveys; the preparation and publication of charts, the Coast Pilot, the magnetic map of Eastern North America, and other results of the work, with the purchase of materials therefor, including compensation of civilians engaged in the work, $300,000; and of this sum $8,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 353, after the word "dollars," to insert "and of this sum $6,000 shall be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read:

Survey of the Pacific coasts, western division: For every purpose and object necessary for and incident to the continuation of the survey of the Pacific coasts of the United States, the Columbia and other rivers, to the head of either tidal influence or of ship-navigation; deep-sea soundings, temperatures, currents, and dredgings along and also in the Japan Stream flowing off these coasts; the triangulation toward the eastern coast, and furnishing points for State surveys; the preparation and publication of charts, the Coast Pilot, the magnetic map of Western North America, and other results of the work, with the purchase of materials therefor, including compensation of civilians employed in the work, $180,000; and of this sum $6,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "miscellaneous objects under the Treasury Department," after line 386, to insert:

Distinctive paper for the United States notes: For paper, including mill expenses, transportation, examination, counting, and delivery, $60,000.

Mr. BECK. I desire only to say that that item is explained in the letter from Colonel Irish which I have already sent to the Reporter. It is placed under the charge of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 389, to insert:

Recoinage of gold and silver coins: For recoinage of gold and silver coins in the Treasury, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Under the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries," after line 411, to insert:

For the reconstruction of buildings at the salmon-fishery on the McCloud River, in California, $10,000, to be available immediately.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "Columbia," in line 429, to strike out "five" and insert "eleven;" after the word "necessary," in line 440, to strike out:

For contribution to maintenance of international bureau of weights and measures, in conformity with terms of convention signed May 20, 1875, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, $2,270, or so much thereof as may be necessary; and in line 446, after the word "all," to strike out "9,470" and insert "13,200;" so as to make the clause read:

For construction and verification of standard weights and measures, including metric standards, for the custom-houses and other offices of the United States, and for the several States, and of mural standards of length in Washington, District of Columbia, $11,000; for rent of fire-proof rooms in building No. 205, New Jersey avenue south, for the safe-keeping and preservation of finished weights, measures, balances, and metric standards, $1,000; for fuel and lights, materials, transportation, traveling and other miscellaneous expenses, $600; for expenses of the attendance of the American member of the international committee on weights and measures at the sexennial general conference provided for in the convention signed May 20, 1875, $600, or so much thereof as may be necessary; in all, $13,200.

Mr. BECK. That is merely a transfer from page 19 to page 66 of the bill. That matter is stricken out there because it is under charge of the Secretary of State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 491, to insert:

And to facilitate the collection of customs duties, and to prevent smuggling, the deputy collector of customs stationed at San Juan Island, in the Puget Sound district, is, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, empowered to enter and clear vessels and collect duties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "all," in line 504, to strike out "twelve thousand one" and insert "thirteen thousand three;" so as to make the clause read:

Salaries and traveling expenses of agents at seal-fisheries in Alaska: For one agent $3,650; one assistant agent, $2,920; two assistant agents, at $2,190 each; necessary traveling expenses of agents in going to and returning from Alaska, at $600 each per annum; in all, $13,350.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 542, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse the President for amount paid for expenses of the commission appointed to go to Louisiana in April 1877, $3,950.73.

Mr. CONKLING. If that amendment is to be agreed to, I shall ask that it be on a vote by yeas and nays, with some confidence that on such a vote it will be rejected, as it has been so often before, not only here, but in another place, to which I have no right to allude.

Mr. BECK. Does the Senator wish a vote now, or does he wish it reserved until we get through with the unobjected amendments?

Mr. CONKLING. I will consult, if I can find out what it is, the preference of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It had better go over perhaps.

Mr. BECK. I am advised by my colleagues on the committee that they would rather we should go on with the unobjected amendments, and then come back to this.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection to any arrangement by which when the Senate is reasonably full we can get the attention of the Senate to this amendment to which for one I am very much opposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The action upon this amendment will be reserved. The reading will proceed.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 547 to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain and report to Congress the harbor, pilot, and other charges to which American and foreign vessels are subject under State laws, and the taxation upon ship-owners, $1,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 552 to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase from F. M. Eastman the copyright and manuscript of his work entitled "Digest of the decisions of the Treasury Department and of the Supreme and circuit courts relating to the tariff, navigation, &c.," $2,500; and the said work shall be printed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury for the use of the Executive Departments, and 3,500 copies shall be printed for the use of the House, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky, who has charge of this bill, if these decisions of the Treasury Department are of such vital importance that we ought to provide for having them published? I suppose that every Secretary of the Treasury makes some regulation of his own, and we shall not have this as a permanent code to guide all future Secretaries of the Treasury in their administration of the office.

Mr. BECK. I am not prepared to give much information in regard to it. It is one of a series of amendments which were sent to us. We had a unanimous report from the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives before us, a very able report, a copy of which I will hand the Senator. We had to accept the statements of gentlemen who came before us with the reports of various committees as to the importance of different matters. All agreed that it would be extremely valuable for the use of this House and the other House in considering matters relative to taxation to have a copy of this book. I thought so and think so yet, and I was very much impressed with the small sum asked for it. Therefore, when it was urged by the Assistant Secretary and had been accepted by the Committee on Ways and Means, and also laid before us by gentlemen who seemed to know all about it, we thought proper to adopt it.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky who is the gentleman who is named in this amendment and of whom this book is to be purchased?

Mr. BECK. I do not know.

Mr. PLUMB. How does he come to have this copyright and manuscript? In whose employ is he?

Mr. BECK. I have not the least idea who the man is. I only know what the Committee on Ways and Means said to us and what the letter of Mr. French says and what other gentlemen say. All agree that it is a very useful compilation. This is the substance of the statement of the Committee on Ways and Means:

The committee find the work for the purchase of which this bill provides to be a digest of the decisions of the Treasury Department relating to the tariff, navigation, &c., contained in the synopsis of decisions published by that Department. The decisions number about six thousand five hundred, and cover a period of twenty-three years. They are contained in sixteen volumes, are indexed separately and imperfectly, with no general index, and can be referred to only by those familiar with them, and even then with difficulty. Great inconvenience often results to the Treasury Department from the difficulty of referring to these decisions.

The work is also a digest of the decisions of the Supreme and circuit courts relating to the tariff, navigation, &c., and also of the decisions upon the same subjects contained in the Opinions of the Attorneys-General.

This work has been carefully and skillfully compiled. The committee believe that it will be of great utility to the Treasury and State Departments, and to any person engaged in a revision of the tariff and navigation laws.

A letter from the Treasury Department, signed by H. F. French, Acting Secretary, reads thus:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 4, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 3d instant, submitting a bill (H. R. No. 7078) authorizing the purchase of Eastman's Digest of the decisions of the Treasury Department and of the Supreme and circuit courts relating to the tariff, navigation, &c., and asking my opinion in regard to the importance and necessity of the digest in question.

This Department is in possession of a series of decisions in relation to customs and navigation from the year 1857 to the present time.

Then, repeating what the committee have said:

These consist in part of entire official letters and in part of abstracts of such letters from the date mentioned. But it has no digest in which those decisions are concisely set forth, and none whatever of the decisions of the courts upon the subjects covered by the Department decisions.

Such a digest as is mentioned in the bill would much abridge the labors of department officials in rendering easily accessible the principles settled by the practice of the Department and the rulings of the courts since 1857, and it would further serve as a guide on questions of customs and navigation, where questions comparatively new may in future arise.

So far as I am able to judge from incomplete examinations of Mr. Eastman's manuscript, his digest well accomplishes the purpose intended by it.

Very respectfully,

H. F. FRENCH,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
House of Representatives.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not doubt that the committee had acted on authority; but the point of my inquiry is this: I suspect that this person is already in the employ of the Government, that he has been doing this work during the time he has been in the employ of the Government, and has been greatly facilitated in doing it by reason of the fact of such employment. If this Digest is important, it occurs to me that the Treasury Department would have discovered it some time before the lapse of twenty-three years, and would have had this gentleman do it under and by virtue of his employment. If it be true, as I suspect it is, that this person is in the employ of the Government, I submit that it is not proper to incur this expenditure to pay him over again to do work for which he has already been paid.

As is suggested by a Senator, this amendment also provides for the printing of this work, so that the expense we incur, although nominally $3,500, is but the entering-wedge to a much larger expenditure to come in under the appropriation for the public printing in a deficiency bill. In other words, we are providing here for what will inevitably be a deficiency. I therefore hope that this amendment will not be agreed to unless the information which I have in regard to the person who has made this digest be incorrect.

Mr. BECK. It is for the Senate to do as they choose. I have stated all I know about it.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Kentucky will give me his attention for a moment it seems to me there are two or three things about this which should not be left as they are, no matter how meritorious the work may be. Here is to be a "Digest of the Decisions of the Treasury Department," relating to two things named "and so forth," a very odd title for a law-book or a book which comes any way near the law; and what that "and so forth" is we do not know. Then:

And the said work shall be printed, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the use of the Executive Departments.

In what numbers is it to be printed? What is to be the size of this edition? Nobody knows; it is left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. And in addition to this "3,500 copies shall be printed for the use of the House and 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate." That is, we have an edition of 4,500 copies provided for and in addition an indefinite edition besides. How much is all this to cost? Very likely the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] if he were here could estimate something about it; but it depends very largely upon the character of the work, what type is to be used, what paper is to be used, and how it is to be bound, it may be ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand dollars. I submit that without knowing what "and so forth" indicates as the scope of this work, and without knowing whether this gentleman as a Senator has informed me was a clerk in the Treasury Department when this work was done, without knowing anything more about it we ought hardly to vote an entirely unrestricted and indefinite sum of money which may be, for aught we know, four or five times as large as we are considering now.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say to the Senator from New York that I am not, on looking at it, satisfied with the amendment as it reads; but it was just one of a series of amendments thrown before us with no time to consider them, examine them, and correct them. The bill did not reach us until Monday, and Senators saw the number of amendments presented and referred.

While I agreed to report this because of the report I have read from the House committee, and because of the statements made by various gentlemen, and because of the representations of the Department, if it is the will of the Senate that it should be stricken out, I have no objection. It can be provided for elsewhere if this is a valuable document, perhaps as a separate item. It is of no importance here. I am perfectly willing it shall be stricken out if the Senate choose.

Mr. KERNAN. I hope it will be stricken out. I do not believe that $3,500 is necessary to buy any such book under any such provision of law as this.

Mr. ALLISON. In accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] I move to amend, in line 559, after the word "Treasury," by inserting the words "one thousand copies for the use of the Executive Departments," and then to strike out "3,500 copies for the House," and insert "2,500 copies," so that the total number of copies will be the same.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. KERNAN. I trust we shall disagree to the amendment as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that this is rather a valuable compilation. I do not think the cost will be very great. It has been prepared by a very intelligent young man, who was formerly, as some Senators may remember, for many years the clerk to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. INGALLS. Where is he now?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know where he is now. Afterward he was for a time employed in the Treasury Department. He was the clerk of the Committee on the Library during the time of Senator Howe's service as chairman of that committee, and is a very competent young man. I can readily see that he has made a valuable compilation of these decisions.

Mr. DAWES. What is the book?

Mr. ALLISON. A compilation of the decisions of the Secretary of the Treasury and the circuit and Supreme courts of the United States in reference to tariff and tax cases.

Mr. DAWES. May I interrupt the Senator from Iowa long enough to have the amendment read at the Clerk's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase from F. M. Eastman the copyright and manuscript of his work entitled Digest of the Decisions of the Treasury Department and of the Supreme and circuit courts relating to the Tariff, Navigation, &c., $2,500; and the said work shall be printed, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, 1,000 copies for the use of the Executive Departments, and 2,500 copies shall be printed for the use of the House and 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. I find in a copy of the last issue of the Official Register the name of Frank M. Eastman borne on the rolls of the Treasury Department as a disbursing clerk at a salary of $1,600 per annum. This edition bears the imprint of the Government Printing House, 1879. I suppose he is still in the employ of the Treasury Department.

Mr. LOGAN. It is true that this gentleman is a disbursing clerk in the Treasury Department. At what time he prepared this digest I do not know, but I understand from the Assistant Secretary in whose office he is that this is a very important matter for the Treasury Department. I think a mere recital of the fact will show that it would be a very convenient book for all of us—Senators as well as persons in the Treasury Department.

I have seen the young gentleman. I know him very well. I do not know at what time he has performed this labor. I presume, however, that he performed it in hours when he was not engaged as disbursing clerk. He could not, of course, perform the work when engaged as disbursing clerk. The presumption is that he performed it in hours when he was not engaged in his office; and if he did so, and made this digest, and the Government desires it, he certainly is entitled to be paid for the copyright. There can be no question about that. Whether the copyright is worth $3,500 I do not know, but that it is a work of some importance I am satisfied. I do not think the item ought to be stricken out of the bill.

So far as the gentleman who has performed the labor is concerned, he is perfectly competent to do it; of that much I am assured. He is a lawyer, a young man of intelligence, a very highly educated gentleman, and doubtless has performed this work in a very satisfactory manner. Although I have not examined the work, I have no doubt that that is the fact.

Mr. BECK. In addition to what I said a little while ago, I desire to say that several times, since I have been in Congress, we have purchased books prepared by men who were clerks in the Departments or other employés of the Government. Generally they are the only men who can afford to take the time to prepare them in connection with the information at their command. We paid Mr. Charles H. Evans $2,000 last year for a compilation of import duties, and we have paid Mr. Lewis Heyl for his tariff digest.

This digest was prepared in the Treasury Department. I do not know this gentleman; I never heard of him before, but I have no doubt he did the work just as well as Mr. Heyl, and the information obtained in the Department enabled him to do it.

The amendment was sent to the committee by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] indorsed by Mr. FRYE, of Maine, and recommended by the Assistant Secretary. It had been reported from the Committee on Ways and Means; and we have submitted it to the Senate. I rather think it is a good thing to do.

Mr. LOGAN. My knowledge of the man satisfied me as to his competency. He is a very competent man to perform this work. There is no doubt upon that point. In my judgment, this work is a valuable one for the Treasury Department and for legislators desiring information in reference to the matters upon which this digest has been made. My own judgment is that it is a very proper thing to purchase the copyright.

Mr. KERNAN. My objection is that we have no information as to how valuable this book is or what it would be deemed worth, and yet we authorize the Government to buy the copyright of this gentleman for $3,500, and authorizing the publication of 4,500 copies.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I have a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. French, in reference to this matter that I will have read.

Mr. WALLACE. It has been read.

Mr. BECK. I read that a few moments ago.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. KERNAN. I think this will be entering upon a line of bookmaking which will not be advantageous to the Government. So far as a digest of the the decisions of the courts is concerned, we have a digest of them in every library. As to a digest of the decisions of the Treasury Department, I assume that those in the Department can readily ascertain what the decisions are; but be that one way or the other, if this is a book that is valuable let the Government buy such copies as it wants. If we begin to buy the copies of compilations made by persons in or out of the Departments and publish them, I fear we are spending money that will never do much good. How many members of Congress will ever look at all into this digest?

I hope we shall strike out this item and let it wait until some committee looks into it and is able to inform us wherein it will be advantageous to the people to buy this copyright and publish 4,500 copies of the work.

Mr. INGALLS. As a part of the same subject, I call attention to the amendment following the one now under consideration:

For the purchase, for the use of Congress, of 1,500 copies of the work entitled The United States Government, by George N. Lamphere, 500 copies for the use of the Senate and 1,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, $2,625.

It appears from the Official Register that this gentleman also, Mr. George N. Lamphere, is borne on the rolls of the office of the Secretary of the Treasury as chief appointment clerk at a salary of $2,500 per annum. I do not know upon what theory the Committee on Appropriations propose to stimulate literary labor. We have provided by law a copyright by which authors are protected in the enjoyment of their literary property. If they prepare a work that the public want and that has valuable and desirable information, it can be disposed of in the ordinary way that books are sold, and the publisher and the author can make arrangements about dividing the profits.

Here are two books that evidently have no value at all except as wares to sell to Congress. I venture to say that if these books are published they will be distributed and take the ordinary course of public documents, and the consequence will be that year after year these gentlemen will prepare new editions of their works for the purpose of selling them in successful appropriations to Congress.

I have in my mind one work that has been heretofore bought in the same way, a book prepared by Mr. Heyl, who was also in the employment of the Government. In an appropriation bill we provided for purchasing his book, and we kept on purchasing it year after year. It is a book that nobody reads and nobody wants. My theory is that if these books have any value they should be put into the market and sold as other books are, and not be brought into Congress for the purpose of being forced upon us through the medium of an appropriation bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to be informed by the Senator from Iowa, who moved an amendment providing a thousand copies for the use of the executive departments, if he knows what officers of the executive department require the use of the book? There are certainly not a thousand officers, not half that many, who could require the work.

Mr. CONKLING. And especially in the Treasury Department. The Senator can state minutely as to that Department.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not arrange the number to cover exactly the number of the officers, but I think if this work is of any value it will be a matter of great convenience in the custom-houses. It is a work of considerable importance with reference to the Treasury. It is not necessary to enumerate the officers, but it is quite possible that it might be of value to some of the other Departments.

Mr. LOGAN. It contains the decisions of the courts in connection with the internal revenue.

Mr. ALLISON. I am obliged to the Senator for helping me. Certainly a few hundred copies could be distributed among the collectors of internal revenue. I am certain, on reflection, that a thousand copies can be very properly distributed in this way.

Mr. PLUMB. If the object is to secure useful literature among Government employés, I submit that a thousand copies are not enough; the number ought not be limited. But as the Government has got along for twenty-three years without it, I think it ought to be able to get along a little longer, until we can ascertain in some way precisely the merit of this work.

Mr. BECK. This bill, as I said, has to reach the House to-day and get into conference very soon or it will be lost. I am sorry that these two items are in the bill; and I do not care how good they are, no matter how important, I will agree that they be stricken out.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Lamphere's book is not open to the criticism made by the Senator from Kansas. I drew the amendment in regard to it myself, and I will give my reasons for it. In the first place I think it will be perceived by every one to be a useful book. It is a text-book for every one who has occasion to do business with the Departments of the Government. It is so useful that a great many Senators no doubt have bought it. I will say with reference to a great many of these works that I have purchased them and put them in the public offices, libraries, &c., in Rhode Island. The large United States maps I purchased at my own expense and put one copy in every library and every public building in the State as a matter of information to our people. I notice that people want books of this kind. The author of the book, Mr. Lamphere, is an employé of the Government, to be sure, but he is a one-armed soldier, and did this work outside of office hours. He has printed this book at his own expense. It is not a popular book, a book that will reach any great sale, and I think it is our duty to encourage him in a work of this kind.

Mr. INGALLS. When was it published?

Mr. BURNSIDE. It was published last year or the year before.

Mr. INGALLS. Has it been exposed for sale in the book-stores?

Mr. BURNSIDE. That I cannot say.

Mr. INGALLS. Has any considerable number of copies been sold?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I know nothing about the book except what I say. I have heard of the young man for many years. I talked to him about the matter nearly a year ago. I know that I distributed twenty-five or thirty copies of the book among the public offices in the State of Rhode Island to very great advantage to our people in the way of instructing them how to transact business with the Departments. I know it would be a very useful thing to do, and I should distribute my copies in that way. Just as I say, I bought a number of the United States maps that the Government published and distributed them to public offices in the State.

I hope the amendment will be adhered to. I know there is a precedent for this course. I have voted for the purchase of books in the Senate very often. This young man has printed his own book, and has not called on the Government of the United States to help him print it. He simply asks the Government to take 1,500 copies; 500 for the use of the Senate, and 1,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PLUMB. Since this discussion commenced I am informed by an authority not to be questioned that the Government issues every month, as it has done for a long time, digests of the decisions made in the Treasury Department for the use of the employés of that Department wherever they may be. I should have supposed of course that that was the case. It is not to be supposed that the Government would have been going on for twenty-three years and no one connected with the Treasury would have had the wit to make a digest which was absolutely necessary. I think it is true that they have them and most Senators have seen such digests in the Departments and elsewhere. They can be had in the Library now.

This it seems to me is only another way of giving to somebody a sum of money which the Government does not need to expend at all, for the reason that the purpose of the expenditure has already been accomplished by the Government in the transaction of its daily business, and that enforces, I think, the necessity for caution in regard to matters of this kind.

My colleague spoke of the succeeding amendment. There are a great many desirable books pleasing to the eye and useful in every way which Senators and members of course would be glad to have, many of which I have no doubt they purchase. I purchased a copy of the work of Mr. Lamphere's because I wanted it, and I wanted it bad enough to pay $3 for it, but I do not care to have the Government now turn around and buy a copy even at the wholesale price to give me another one or half a dozen, as the case may be, in order that they may be distributed among my constituents.

I think, in the first place, the Government printing of books ought to be limited as nearly as possible to strictly governmental objects. The Government ought not to engage in the printing and publication of books which come in competition with private publishers. It is a very seductive thing, of course, to have a lot of good books, gilt and nicely bound, to give to somebody, but it is not a proper way, I submit, to make use of the public money to do anything of that kind.

There is no reason, as I think, why Mr. Lamphere's work should be purchased at the expense of the Government any more than many other books I could name. While no doubt it would be very desirable for members of this body and the other House to have copies of this book, there are other things in the same line which it is desirable to have and which can be had by a person who is sufficiently moved to put his hand into his own pocket and to go into the nearest bookstore and disburse the money necessary to buy it. I submit it is not fair at all that persons shall have books they are not willing to buy themselves and which are directly in the line of private expenditure, and have them provided for out of the public purse.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The same principle applies to the public printing of all our books. We do not hesitate to authorize the printing of three or four hundred thousand copies of the Agricultural Report, which I commend very much indeed. I would be perfectly willing to vote for enough copies to cover the State of Kansas with agricultural reports; but when a book which is prepared by an industrious, intelligent crippled soldier during the time when he is not at work in his office, is offered, and is offered at cost, then the Senator from Kansas is very modest in reference to his expenditure of public money. The same principle precisely is applied to the printing of our public documents which are distributed. Thousands and millions of dollars are appropriated every year for that purpose; but when this little appropriation for this one-armed soldier who has industriously and intelligently produced a work of this kind which is very useful, useful to every Senator on this floor even the most intelligent, giving information as to how he can most easily transact business with the Departments—I say when a proposition of that kind is made then Senators seem to be very much exercised.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island, why discriminate in favor of this particular industrious soldier? I think there are other industrious soldiers, who also have published works that it would be desirable to have.

Mr. BURNSIDE. For any work giving as much public information, published by a soldier or any one else possessing as much merit as this, I would vote to print it.

Mr. LOGAN. This debate seems to have moved itself from the paragraph we are discussing on to another one that is not before the Senate. The question of publishing Lamphere's book is not before the Senate at present.

In regard to the publication of the digest of the decisions of the Treasury Department, the Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] mentioned the fact that the matter ought to be investigated by a committee. If the Senator will examine the report of the House committee that accompanied this amendment to the Committee on Appropriations, he will find in the report made in the other House by Mr. FRYE the following language:

> The committee find the work for the purchase of which this bill provides to be a digest of the decisions of the Treasury Department relating to the tariff, navigation, &c., contained in the synopsis of decisions published by that Department. The decisions number about six thousand five hundred and cover a period of twenty-three years. They are contained in sixteen volumes, are indexed separately and imperfectly, with no general index, and can be referred to only by those familiar with them, and even then with difficulty. Great inconvenience often results to the Treasury Department from the difficulty of referring to these decisions.

The work is also a digest of the decisions of the Supreme and circuit courts relating to the tariff, navigation, &c., and also of the decisions upon the same subject contained in the Opinions of the Attorneys-General.

This work has been carefully and skillfully compiled. The committee believe that it will be of great utility to the Treasury and State Departments, and to any person engaged in a revision of the tariff and navigation laws.

Mr. EATON. From what paper does the Senator read?

Mr. LOGAN. I am reading from the report of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives made on this subject, and I read it in response to the Senator from New York, who said the matter should be examined by a committee. I simply read from the report to show that it had been examined by a committee and reported favorably.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Kentucky has indicated that the Committee on Appropriations would not insist on the amendment so as to put an end to this discussion, but I want to say one word to the Senator from Kansas. He spoke of a book issued by the Department similar to this digest, and contrasted it with this book. The publication made annually by the Department is a digest of the appropriations and nothing else.

Mr. PLUMB. Oh, no.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I know what I am speaking about.

Mr. PLUMB. What I want to say is that the Department issues every month a digest of the decisions of every one of its bureaus, and also of the Secretary of the Treasury himself.

Mr. LOGAN. But this compilation contains the decisions of the Supreme Court in reference to questions of tariff and navigation, which is entirely different from what the Senator refers to.

Mr. PLUMB. But those are already contained in the decisions of the Supreme Court itself and they are accessible in the library of the Treasury as well as in other libraries.

Mr. LOGAN. It is very true that the decisions of the Supreme Court are accessible to every lawyer, but not to every one who has transactions with the Department.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have no wish to continue this debate. I simply say that the Senator from Kentucky on the part of the committee has stated that these amendments would not be insisted on. He has said that the committee is willing to take that course. The Senator is mistaken entirely as to any comparison between these two digests. The Senate committee acted more upon the report made by the House committee and the representations of members of the House than upon their own examinations; but as far as the committee are concerned it is immaterial to them whether the item remains or is stricken out.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from West Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, if this appropriation is based upon an estimate only as to the cost of printing or binding, or if there is beyond that compensation for the authorship of the book? Is the appropriation made upon an estimate only as to the cost of printing the publication?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator will see that one of the clauses is for the purchase of the copyright and the other is for printing copies.

Mr. PADDOCK. I speak of the amendment now under consideration, not the Lamphere item. Is it for the purchase of the copyright or is it for the purchase of the book at the cost of printing and binding?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as amended will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase from F. M. Eastman the copyright and manuscript of his work entitled Digest of the Decisions of the Treasury Department and of the Supreme and Circuit Courts relating to the tariff, navigation, &c., $2,500; and the said work shall be printed, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, 1,000 copies for the use of the Executive Departments, and 2,500 copies shall be printed for the use of the House and 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. There are sixteen volumes of this report. Multiply that by $3,500 and it makes $54,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, no; not sixteen printed volumes.

Mr. PLUMB. According to the statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury there are sixteen printed volumes, and the appropriation to cover this cost would amount to about $50,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I think not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 562, to insert:

For the purchase, for the use of Congress, of 1,500 copies of the work entitled The United States Government, by George N. Lamphere, 500 copies for the use of the Senate, and 1,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, $2,625.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, after line 568, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to procure information concerning and to make inspection of neat cattle shipped from any port in the United States to any foreign port, so as to enable him to cause to be issued to the shippers of such cattle certificates showing in proper cases that such cattle are free from the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia, the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I will ask the committee to consent to an increase of the sum from $10,000 to $15,000.

Mr. BECK. The Department officials want $15,000. They perhaps could get along with $10,000, but if the Senator from Iowa who is watching the pleuro-pneumonia bill thinks $15,000 had better be appropriated, for one I will consent to it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am obliged to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa move to strike out $10,000 and insert $15,000?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 576, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse to Ainsworth R. Spofford, Librarian of Congress, the amount stolen from his disbursing clerk on the 28th day of May, 1880, $2,640.

Mr. BECK. There is a typographical error in line 578. It reads, "to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse to;" "to" should be stricken out before "Ainsworth R. Spofford."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be agreed to. Will the Senate agree to the amendment as amended?

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 586, in the item for the National Board of Health, after the word "that," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the proviso read:

That $75,000 of the appropriation made by act of June 2, 1879, entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States," shall be applied to the same purposes; and no more money shall be expended for the above purposes out of any appropriations heretofore made or by virtue of any previous law.

Mr. BECK. We gave that item a good deal of consideration, and required a revised estimate from the National Board of Health, which I desire to have published in the RECORD; it may be useful in conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be published in the RECORD at the request of the Senator.

The paper is as follows:

Estimates for National Board of Health.

Office expenses:
1.	Miscellaneous investigations into matters affecting the public health		$15,000 00
2.	Pay and expenses of members		10,000 00
3.	Pay and expenses of inspectors		10,000 00
4.	Printing Bulletin, blanks, &c		10,000 00
5.	Rent, light, and fuel		1,700 00
6.	Stationery		1,000 00
7.	Telegrams		500 00
8.	Postage		250 00
9.	Clerks, messengers, and laborers		19,950 00
10.	Miscellaneous expenses		1,600 00
			70,000 00
Maintenance of quarantine stations of the board:
11.	Ship Island	$18,500 00
12.	Sapilo	5,000 00
13.	Hampton Roads, Virginia	3,000 00
14.	Mississippi River	32,000 00
15.	Aid to State local boards	20,000 00
16.	Repairs to Ship Island	1,500 00
			80,000 00
Total			150,000 00

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "mounds," in line 613, to insert "and be available immediately;" so as to make the clause read:

North American ethnology, Smithsonian Institution: For the purpose of continuing ethnological researches among the North American Indians, under the direction of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, $25,000; $5,000 of which shall be expended in continuing archæological investigations relating to mound-builders and prehistoric mounds, and be available immediately.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "arrears of pay and bounty," after the word "appropriated," in line 20, to strike out "out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" and insert "the sum of $300,000 or;" so as to make the clause read:

That with a view to the prompt payment of claims for arrears of pay and bounty due to officers and enlisted men of the regular and volunteer forces, and their heirs and legal representatives, there shall be, and hereby is, appropriated the sum of $300,000, or so much as may be required to pay said claims, under the following heads of appropriations: "Pay to two and three year volunteers," "bounty to volunteers and their widows and legal heirs," and "pay, &c., of the Army:" Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress, at the commencement of each regular session, the amount that has been paid out under this provision during the preceding fiscal year.

Mr. BECK. The only change we made there was to send for an estimate as to how much would be necessary, and we received information that about three hundred thousand dollars would be required. Two hundred and fifty thousand and odd dollars being paid this year we believed it would be better to insert the sum estimated for than to leave it indefinite. That is all there is in that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for "armories and arsenals," after line 638, to insert:

For machinery and shop-fixtures, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "buildings and grounds in and around Washington and the Executive Mansion," after line 706, to insert:

For paving with asphaltum the semi-circular roadway in front of the Executive Mansion, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "Mansion," in line 712, to strike out "five hundred" and insert "two thousand;" after the word "dollars," in line 713, to insert "to be available immediately," and in line 717, after the word "all," to strike out "thirty-eight thousand" and insert "thirty-nine thousand five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Executive Mansion: For care of and repairs to the Executive Mansion, and for furniture, $30,000; for constructing elevator in the Executive Mansion, $2,000, to be available immediately; fuel for the Executive Mansion and the greenhouses, $2,000; care and necessary repairs of the greenhouses, $5,500; in all, $39,500.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask the committee to explain the necessity of the item for constructing an elevator in the Executive Mansion, $2,000? What is the necessity for that?

Mr. BECK. The House determined for reasons sufficient as I thought to construct an elevator in the Executive Mansion and made an appropriation of $500 for doing so, believing that was enough for the purpose. Colonel Casey, the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, made a careful estimate of what was necessary to construct such an elevator as ought to be constructed there. He brought the estimate to us and assured us he could not do what the House desired to have done for less than $2,000, and as they had determined to build the elevator and thought they were giving enough, and as the actual amount necessary to do what all desired was $2,000 instead of $500 we struck out $500 and inserted $2,000. The principal object I believe the House had in view, and I think a very laudable one, is that an aged member of the family of the incoming President is unable to walk up and down the steps, and they desire that she should have an elevator in the House, and I think the Senate will agree to give the sum necessary for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 724, after the word "that," to insert "for each burner not connected with a meter in the lamps on the public grounds;" and in line 731, after the word "material," to insert "in the lamps on the public grounds;" so as to make the clause read:

Lighting the Executive Mansion and public grounds: For gas, pay of lamplighters, gas-fitters, plumbers, plumbing, lamp-posts, matches, and repairs of all kinds; fuel for office, for the watchmen's lodges, and for the greenhouses in the nursery, $15,000: Provided, That for each burner not connected with a meter in the lamps on the public grounds no more than $25 shall be paid per lamp for gas, including lighting, cleaning, and keeping in repair the lamps, under any expenditure provided for in this act; and in case a contract cannot be made at that rate the engineer in charge is hereby authorized to substitute other illuminating material in the lamps on the public grounds, and to use so much of the sum hereby appropriated as may be necessary for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 748, to insert "to be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read:

Building for State, War, and Navy Departments: For continuing the construction of the building; to cover inside iron-work; plumbing and gas-fitting; granite stairs; heating-apparatus; plastering and stucco-work; materials for approaches; lumber for doors, sash, and flooring; labor and contingencies, $450,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 749, to insert:

For preparing granite for the construction of the west and center wings, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 755, to insert "to be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read:

Continuation of Washington Monument: Earth embankments, marble, granite, iron frame-work, machinery, tools, labor, and office expenses, $150,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the head of "Signal Service," in line 772, before the word "books" to insert "original studies;" and after the word "for," in line 774, to strike out "three hundred and seventy-five" and insert "four hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Signal service:

Observation and report of storms: For the expenses of the observation and report of storms by telegraph and signal for the benefit of commerce and agriculture throughout the United States; for manufacture, purchase, and repair of meteorological and other necessary instruments; for telegraphing reports; for expenses of storm signals announcing the probable approach and force of storms; for continuing the establishment and connection of stations at life-saving stations and light-houses; for instrument-shelters; for hire, furniture, and expenses of offices maintained for public use in cities and ports receiving reports; for river reports; for maps and bulletins to be displayed in chambers of commerce and boards of trade rooms, and for distribution; for original studies, books, periodicals, newspapers, and stationery; and for incidental expenses not otherwise provided for, $400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 800, to insert:

And the unexpended balance, not exceeding $8,000, of the appropriation for survey of northern and northwestern lakes for the fiscal year 1881 is hereby reappropriated and made available for the same purpose.

So as to make the clause read:

Survey of northern and northwestern lakes: For water-level observations and reductions, comparisons of standards of base apparatus and reductions, printing and issuing charts for use of navigators, completion of publication of final report, office rent, clerk hire, fuel, and miscellaneous, $18,000; and the unexpended balance, not exceeding $8,000, of the appropriation for survey of northern and northwestern lakes for the fiscal year 1881 is hereby reappropriated and made available for the same purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 804, to insert:

Surveys and reconnaissances in military divisions and departments: For military surveys and reconnaissances, and surveys of military reservations, by the engineer officers attached to the various headquarters of military divisions and departments, being an average of $5,000 for each of the nine military divisions and departments west of the Mississippi River, and $5,000 for publication of maps, $50,000; this sum to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 831, to insert:

For the purchase of the private papers of the late confederate Generals Braxton Bragg and Leonidas Polk relating to the late war of the rebellion, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 844, to insert:

For the construction of a public building at Fortress Monroe, Virginia, for a library and collections of the artillery school, and also for offices for the headquarters at the fort, in accordance with the provisions of section 1136 of the Revised Statutes, $30,000.

Mr. BECK. I desire to be allowed to hand a letter from the Secretary of War to the Reporter regarding that matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter of the Secretary of War referred to by the Senator from Kentucky will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, March 1, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to recommend that a clause be inserted in the sundry civil appropriation bill, to make an appropriation of $30,000 for erection of a building at Fort Monroe for the library collections of the artillery school and for offices for the headquarters. Such an appropriation is deemed necessary and proper at this time on the grounds set forth in Senate Executive Document No. 2, current series, which promulgates my recommendation of December 6, 1880, on this subject, and which exhibits the fact that as required by section 1136 of the Revised Statutes, plans and estimates for the building were then submitted to the Senate.

Very respectfully,

ALEX. RAMSEY,
Secretary of War.

Hon. HENRY G. DAVIS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. An amendment escaped my attention for a moment and I ask leave to go back to it to save calling it up in the Senate when the bill is reported. It is in the upper part of the thirty-fifth page.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be taken up.

Mr. BECK. I do not object to the Senator taking it up now.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know but that the amendment is all right, and if it has the assent of the Committee on Appropriations without any division in that committee I am very strongly inclined to believe it is all right.

Mr. BECK. I will hand to the Senator a number of papers with regard to it before we are through.

Mr. HOAR. I think there are one or two points that should be stated before it passes, so that it should not go through sub silentio. In the first place what is the evidence that these papers are worth $20,000? In the next place, ought there not to be lodged in some public officer the right to see what papers we get. There is no description of the papers to be purchased. They are to be private papers. I should like to have the Senator from Kentucky state what security there is for the Government getting $20,000.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator will allow the amenhment to be passed over until we get through with the other amendments and come back to it, I will furnish him with all the information I have.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to attack what the committee think proper, but I want to know something about it.

Mr. BECK. We had a very full hearing on the subject and a number of papers were furnished to us, all of which I will give when it comes up at the conclusion of the other amendments of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Action will be reserved on this amendment until the other amendments are acted upon.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, before the word "silver," in line 932, to strike out "subsidiary;" in line 938, before the word "passage," to strike out "its" and insert "the;" and after the word "passage" to insert "of this act;" so as to make the clause read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transport free of charge silver coin when requested to do so: Provided, That an equal amount in coin or currency shall have been deposited in the Treasury by the applicant or applicants; and that there is hereby appropriated $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for that purpose, and that the same be available from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "war," in line 945, to strike out:

Is directed to sell at public auction, after due advertisement, all the old clothing now held for the national military homes for disabled volunteer soldiers, and, upon proper estimates from time to time, to turn the proceeds over to the managers thereof.

And insert:

Be directed to turn over to the managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers all the old clothing now held for issue to the National Home.

So as to make the clause read:

Support of National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, current expenses including construction and repairs: For the central branch, for the eastern branch, for the northwestern branch, for the southern branch, and for out-door relief and incidental expenses, $950,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War be directed to turn over to the managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers all the old clothing now held for issue to the National Home. Said managers are authorized to estimate for building and maintenance at the central branch of a building or buildings for the safe and proper keeping of the insane. And General John Love, of the State of Indiana, one of the managers of said homes, having died, General George B. McClellan, of the State of New Jersey, is hereby appointed to fill the vacancy for the unexpired term.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 963, to insert:

Road from Vicksburgh, Mississippi, to the national cemetery: For completion of roadway from Vicksburgh, Mississippi, to the national cemetery near that city, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 967, to insert:

For constructing a carriage-way from New Market street in the city of Jeffersonville, Indiana, to the United States military depot in said city, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "third," in line 976, to strike out "and fourth volumes" and insert "volume;" so as to make the clause read:

Printing catalogue of the library of the Surgeon-General's Office: For printing and binding the third volume of the catalogue of the library of the Surgeon-General's Office, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1002, to insert:

To continue the permanent improvement of the barracks on the present site at Omaha, Nebraska, $30,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senate will now go back to the amendment on the thirty-seventh page, I desire to offer an amendment which I understand will be accepted by the committee, and which I think will remove any possible objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky, in charge of the bill, consent to go back to the amendment on page 35?

Mr. BECK. Let the Senator's proposition be read; I will hear it.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to amend the amendment by making it, instead of "$20,000," read "a sum not exceeding $20,000."

Mr. BECK. That is right.

Mr. HOAR. Then I desire to add this proviso.

Provided, That the President of the United States shall be satisfied that all such papers now in existence are delivered over to the United States, and that the same are of historic importance and value equal to the sum paid.

Mr. BECK. I make no objection to that.

Mr. CONKLING. Should that amendment be adopted, it would be as convenient to know then as well as now why confederate officers are selected and provision made for paying $10,000 each to their survivors for private papers of theirs. On what principle is it that speaking of a war in which hundreds of officers were conspicuous two are arbitrarily selected and it is proposed to give to the families of each a sum not exceeding $10,000 for their private papers? If this is to be done at all, I should like to have it passed over for I want to offer an amendment adding a number of Union generals whose private papers I think would be at least equally interesting and equally valuable.

Mr. BECK. I desired to have it passed over and it was so, but the Senator from Massachusetts suggested an amendment to it, I think a very proper one. I am willing that it shall be passed over again if Senators wish; but before I sit down, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from New York, I will say that in the act approved June 16, 1880, this provision was made:

And the Secretary of War is authorized to negotiate with the legal representatives of the late confederate Generals Bragg and Polk for the purchase of their private papers relating to the late war, and said Secretary shall report thereon at the next session of Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. Has that report been made?

Mr. BECK. That authority was given: that report has been made. As I understand it the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] has it, and is familiar with all the facts. The papers have been delivered and part of them are now being published; I believe a majority of those belonging to General Polk are now being published as part of the history of the rebellion. Those belonging to General Bragg have been indexed, and the publication has not yet begun, but the Government is in possession of all the papers under that negotiation. Papers of like character belonging to Albert Sidney Johnston were purchased some years ago and $10,000 paid for them. A commission was appointed, of which President-elect Garfield was one, and other papers were purchased. Then the act of last year authorized these negotiations, and in accordance with it the papers have been delivered, so that there is some question of good faith I think involved in this. That is the only reason why I thought it ought to be put on this bill; but I will pass it over at the request of the Senator from New York and show him all the papers I have.

Mr. CONKLING. I shall be glad if the Senator will do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall action be had on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, or shall the matter be passed over?

Several SENATORS. Let it be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 1006, to insert:

For the erection of permanent barracks and officers' quarters at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, according to plans to be adopted by the Secretary of War, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1010, to insert:

For the expenses of the surveys to be made across the peninsula of Maryland and Delaware to connect by canal the waters of the Delaware and Chesapeake Bays, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $10,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire to ask that that amendment may be passed over for the present. I am under the impression that it was submitted to the Committee on Commerce, that it was embraced in the river and harbor bill, and was finally stricken from that bill.

Mr. WHYTE. Stricken out on the very ground that it was not proper in that bill because it was for a survey of a canal. I understand that was the report of the conference committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I was not aware on what ground. I know the surveys recommended by the Committee on Commerce are embraced in the river and harbor bill.

Mr. WHYTE. This comes from a different committee entirely.

Mr. BECK. It was the unanimous report of the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, after an examination all winter, in which a good deal of testimony was taken. It is a matter of very great importance, and this survey may save a great deal of money hereafter.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I was under the impression that the matter was before the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire the amendment reserved?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I do not desire it if that is the case.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 1015, to insert:

For the purchase of a suitable site in the city of Washington for the erection of a brick and metal fire-proof building to be used and occupied by the Pension Bureau, the building to be erected in accordance with plans approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior, under the supervision of the Quartermaster-General of the United States Army, the site for which shall be selected by him, subject to the approval of the Secretaries aforesaid, both as to location and price, and the title to the land to be approved by the Attorney-General of the United States, $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1027, to insert:

For the purchase of a suitable site in the city of Washington for the erection of a brick and metal fire-proof building to be used for the safe-keeping of records of the executive departments not required in the present executive offices for constant reference, the building to be erected in accordance with plans approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior, under the supervision of the Quartermaster-General of the United States Army, the site for which shall be selected by him, subject to the approval of the Secretaries aforesaid, both as to location and price, and the title to the land to be approved by the Attorney-General of the United States, $200,000.

Mr. BECK. Before passing from the portion of the bill about additional buildings I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 42, line 1004, and strike out "at Omaha," and insert "on the present site near Omaha," the building being near Omaha, and not at Omaha.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection that correction will be made. The Chair hears none, and the amendment will be so modified.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the appropriations for "navy-yards and stations," after the word "dollars," in line 1046, to insert "to be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read:

Navy-yard, Boston, Massachusetts: For repairing rope-walk, $20,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1052, to insert:

For erecting a new boiler-house for the naval hospital, Mare Island, California, $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1055, to insert:

Navy-yard, Pensacola, Florida: To continue the improvement of the Pensacola navy-yard in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1064, to insert:

For the construction of suitable barracks and quarters for the officers and enlisted men of the Marine Corps at Norfolk navy-yard, $45,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "Government," in line 1079, to strike out "the sum of;" and in line 1081, after the word "necessary," to strike out "is hereby appropriated;" so as to make the clause read:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to protect and preserve cemeteries in foreign countries used for the most part for the burial of citizens of this Government, $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1081, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to immediately charter or purchase, equip, and supply a vessel for the prosecution of a search for the steamer Jeannette, of the Arctic exploring expedition, (which the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to undertake,) and such other vessels as may be found to need assistance during said cruise, $175,000: Provided, That said vessel shall be wholly manned by volunteers from the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1090, to insert:

Armory, Naval Academy: For the erection of an armory for the safe-keeping and preservation of arms, equipments, and ammunition, in lieu of the present wooden building, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1094, to insert:

Repairs of building, Naval Academy: For the necessary alterations and repairs of the building of the department of steam engineering, $3,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1098, to insert:

Barracks and quarters at the Naval Academy: For construction of suitable barracks and quarters for the officers and enlisted men of the Marine Corps, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. As the reasons for these amendments for barracks at Norfolk and Annapolis and the erection of an armory for safe-keeping and preservation of the arms and equipments at the Naval Academy, I desire to place upon record letters from the Secretary of the Navy.

The letters are as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 15, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to call the attention of the committee to the importance of having made, at the present session of Congress, appropriations for the construction of suitable barracks and quarters for the marines at Annapolis, Pensacola, and Norfolk. Such quarters and barracks are very much needed for the comfort and efficiency of this branch of the service.

For quarters and barracks at Pensacola, the sum of $100,000 is necessary. This is the estimate of the board ordered recently by the Department to visit the Pensacola yard and report what is necessary to put it in an effective condition.

The sum of $40,000 is required for the construction of barracks at Annapolis. This improvement was recommended by the board of visitors to the Naval Academy, in June last.

The sum of $45,000 is required for the construction of barracks at the Norfolk navy-yard.

The officers and privates of the Marine Corps stationed at Annapolis have, for many years, suffered the inconvenience of unhealthy and unsuitable quarters and accommodations, and I urgently present the subject to the attention of Congress.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. H. G. DAVIS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 19, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to call the attention of the Senate to the importance of amending the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and to earnestly request that provision may be made, in accordance with estimates submitted (page 148, Book of Estimates) for "the erection of an armory for the safe-keeping and preservation of arms, equipments, and ammunition, in lieu of the present wooden building, which is entirely unsuited for the purpose, and now beyond repair, $25,000; the necessary alterations and repairs of the building of the department of steam engineering, $3,600; total Naval Academy, $28,600."

The small amount asked for the alterations and repairs of the "steam building" ($3,600) is an absolute necessity; owing to the fact that some of the foundation-work for the support of the columns and machinery were originally made of wood and placed on the top of piles, which has rotted away; also, that the number of cadets at the academy is now much larger than when the building was constructed, and it is necessary to make some alterations, in order to properly accommodate them during instruction. The floor in the center of the building has settled some four inches.

The present armory and drill-room is a rough board building, erected for temporary use at the time the Naval Academy was transferred from Newport, Rhode Island, to Annapolis. It is the only building at the academy for the storage of the large amount of the different classes of small-arms and artillery used in the instruction of the cadets. It is also the only place in which the cadets can be drilled in cold and bad weather. It is now unfit and unsafe for this purpose, as it is old and rotten and has twice nearly fallen down. To keep it erect it has been necessary to shore it up with timbers the whole length (southeast side) on the side opposite to the direction of the prevailing winds.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. GOFF, JR.,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. WILLIAM A. WHEELER,
Vice-President of the United States.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "public buildings," in line 1120, after the word "the," to strike out "same" and insert "rooms;" so as to make the clause read:

Capitol extension: For work on the Capitol and general repairs thereof, for fire-proofing the gallery of the National Statuary Hall and the rooms adjoining, for shelving the rooms for the accommodation of the House documentary library, for cutting doorway from the northwestern room to connect with the Congressional Library, and for shelving such rooms in the basement story of the south wing of the Capitol as the Speaker may designate for the reception of the stationery and files to be moved from the rooms connected with the Hall, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1132, to insert:

For fire-proofing the roof of the National Statuary Hall, $26,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1134, to insert:

To enable the Joint Committee on the Library to purchase works of art, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1156, to insert:

Rent of building for Court of Claims: To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the rent for that part of the Freedman's bank building as is occupied by the Court of Claims, $3,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "expenses of the collection of revenue from sales of public lands" before the word "district," in line 1234, to strike out "ninety-three;" so as to make the clause read:

For salaries and commissions of registers of land offices and receivers of public moneys at district land offices, at not exceeding three thousand dollars each, $450,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "surveying the public lands," in line 1248, after the word "dollars," to insert "to be immediately available;" in line 1254, after the word "mountainous," to strike out "and" and insert "or;" and in line 1257, after the word "lines," to insert:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to repeal or modify the provisions of sections of the Revised Statutes numbered 2404 and 2405, in regard to surveys to be made in California, Oregon, and Washington Territory.

So as to make the clause read:

Surveying the public lands:

For surveying the public lands, $300,000, to be immediately available, at rates not exceeding $12 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $10 for township, and $8 for section lines, except that the Commissioner of the General Land Office may allow, for the survey of standard and meander lines through lands heavily timbered, mountainous, or covered with dense undergrowth, a sum not exceeding $16 per linear mile for standard lines, $14 for township, and $10 for section lines: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to repeal or modify the provisions of sections of the Revised Statutes numbered 2404 and 2405, in regard to surveys to be made in California, Oregon, and Washington Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1286, to insert:

For running connection lines, guide meridians, and township lines in the strip of public land lying north of the State of Texas, and bounded on the north by the States of Colorado and Kansas, to be done under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $18,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. I want to submit an amendment to come in after the word "dollars" in line 1310, to be subject to my call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas proposes to offer an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 1310, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That in addition to the duties of the Director of the Geological Survey as now prescribed by law, he may extend his examination of the geological structure and mineral resources and products into the respective States, when requested by the authorities thereof.

Mr. BECK. I reserve all points of order against that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not now offered, but notice given of it.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Geological Survey," after line 1315, to insert:

Hot Springs reservation, Arkansas: For the improvement of Hot Springs Creek within the limits of the permanent reservation at Hot Springs, Arkansas, the erection of a wall along its west bank, and for such other improvements of the reservation as may be necessary, the sum of $33,744.78, the amount received for rents at Hot Springs and covered into the Treasury, to be immediately available and expended under the direction and supervision of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. BECK. I desire to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of the Interior relative to that amendment, which explains it so well that I need say nothing.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 29, 1881.

SIR: By the act of Congress relating to the Hot Springs reservation in the State of Arkansas, approved March 3, 1877, the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to use the money received for water rents for the protection and necessary improvement of the reservation. Before the date of this act the receiver appointed by the Court of Claims under the act of June 11, 1870, had collected the sum of $33,744.78 for rents, which amount was covered into the Treasury of the United States. An improvement is very desirable for which there is no fund on hand. The west line of the permanent reservation at Hot Springs, Arkansas, forms the east line of Valley street, the principal thoroughfare in the town. Before this street can be graded to the lines established by the Hot Springs commission it will be necessary to construct a substantial stone wall along the line of the creek running in front of the reservation. As this creek is within the limit of the permanent reservation it is proper that the expense necessary for its improvement should be borne by the United States. I therefore recommend that the amount collected by the receiver, $33,744.78, and covered into the United States Treasury by warrant No. 1050, fourth quarter, 1877, and warrant No. 1644, third quarter, 1878, be appropriated for the improvement of the Hot Springs Creek, and for the erection of the wall along its west bank, and for such other improvements of the reservation as may be necessary, the work to be done under the direction and supervision of the Department of the Interior.

Very respectfully,

C. SCHURZ, Secretary.

The SPEAKER
Of the House of Representatives, Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Government Hospital for the Insane," in line 1340, after the word "of," to strike out "such persons as are entitled to admission therein under the provisions of chapter 4 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, $100,000," and in lieu thereof to insert:

The insane of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and revenue-cutter service and of all persons who have become insane since their entry into the military or naval service of the United States, and who are indigent, and of the indigent insane from the District of Columbia, $155,000; and of this sum not exceeding $1,000 may be used for transporting patients to their friends.

So as to make the clause read:

Government Hospital for the Insane:

Current expenses, Government Hospital for the Insane: For support, clothing, and treatment in the Government Hospital for the Insane of the insane of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Revenue-Cutter service, and of all persons who have become insane since their entry into the military or naval service of the United States, and who are indigent, and of the indigent insane from the District of Columbia, $155,000; and of this sum not exceeding $1,000 may be used for transporting patients to their friends.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky why the committee proposes to strike out the words "such persons as are entitled to admission therein under the provisions of chapter 4 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, $100,000," and insert these other words with an increased amount. What is the reason of that amendment striking out the provision referring to the statutes?

Mr. BECK. The sundry civil act for the current year provides:

That hereafter the admissions to the hospital shall be limited to such persons as are entitled to treatment therein under the provisions of title 59, chapter 4, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and under the act approved March 3, 1875, chapter 156, second session Forty-third Congress.

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish to give notice that after the committee's amendments have been considered and passed upon, I shall offer an amendment to come in on page 56, at the end of line 1350, and I ask to have it read at this time and I will explain it afterward.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana gives notice that after the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations have been acted on, he will offer an amendment to this amendment, which will be reported now for information.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they hereby are, authorized and directed to pass to the credit of Charles H. Nicholls, late superintendent of the Government Hospital for the Insane, the sum of $3,037.09, that being the amount disallowed in his accounts, and being the difference in salary between $2,500 and $4,000 per annum from June 22, 1874, to June 30, 1876, said disallowance having been made to conform to the requirements of the Revised Statutes, section 4839, adopted June 22, 1874; and the salary of the said superintendent is hereby fixed at $4,000 per annum, as originally provided in act of March 2, 1867.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator will have it sent to the committee-room to be placed on the deficiency bill, I think it will be more likely to be passed there. I believe it is all right.

Mr. VOORHEES. I may take that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for "Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb," after line 1366, to insert:

For the improvement and inclosure of grounds, $3,000

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Indian affairs," after the line 1400, to insert:

To purchase from the Creek Nation of Indians, for the use of the Seminole Indians, at the price of $1 per acre, 175,000 acres of land adjacent, on the east, to the dividing line between that portion of the Creek domain ceded to the United States by the Creek treaty of June 14, 1866, and that portion retained by the Creeks, being the land belonging to the Creek Nation upon which the Seminoles were erroneously located by the authorities of the United States, supposing it to be the land granted to the Seminoles by the third article of the treaty with the Seminoles dated March 21, 1866, $175,000; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to purchase said lands from the Creek Nation of Indians for the use of the Seminole Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1416, to insert:

To pay for the survey of the tract of land, to embrace 175,000 acres, authorized by this act to be purchased from the Creek Nation of Indians for the use of the Seminole Indians, $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cause said lands to be surveyed and set apart for the use of the Seminole Nation of Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I hold in my hand relative to that matter important letters from the Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, which I shall hand to the Reporter to be inserted in the RECORD.

The letters are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, February 18, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to invite the attention of the Department to a question that has been a matter of dispute and disturbance since 1867 between the Seminoles and Creeks, in Indian Territory—the present location of the Seminoles. The history of the matter is, briefly as possible, as follows:

By the third article of the Creek treaty of June 14, 1866, (Stats. 14, page 786,) the Creeks ceded to the United States the west half of their entire domain, "to be sold to and used as homes for such other civilized Indians as the United States may choose to settle thereon." The Creek domain at that date embraced the region designated in red on the map herewith. The eighth article of the treaty made it the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause the line dividing the Creek country to be accurately surveyed, the expense to be paid by the United States.

By the third article of the Seminole treaty of March 21, 1866, (Stats. 14, page 756,) the Seminoles ceded their entire domain to the United States "to locate other Indians and freedmen thereon," the United States agreeing to pay therefor to the Seminoles the sum of $325,362. By the same article the United States granted to the Seminoles 200,000 acres of the lands acquired by cession from the Creeks. The lands thus granted to the Seminoles were to be taken from the extreme eastern portion of the tract ceded by the Creeks, as is evident from the terms of the grant in the treaty, although in that respect the treaty is loosely worded, the 200,000 acres granted to the Seminoles being described as follows:

"Beginning on the Canadian River where the line dividing the Creek lands according to the terms of their sale to the United States by their treaty of February 6, 1866, following said line due north to where said line crosses the north fork of the Canadian River; thence up said north fork of the Canadian River a distance sufficient to make 200,000 acres by running due south to the Canadian River; thence down said Canadian River to the place of beginning."

It is clear that the line separating the westerly half of the Creek domain ceded to the United States from the easterly half, retained by the Creeks, was intended to be the east line of the Seminole 200,000 acres tract; that the south and north boundaries of this tract were to be the Canadian River and north fork of the Canadian River, respectively, and that the west boundary must be a line parallel to the east boundary and distant therefrom far enough to include the requisite number of acres. The reference in this treaty to the date of the Creek treaty (February 6, 1866) is evidently either a misprint or a mistake of the draughtsman, as there is no treaty of that date between the United States and the Creeks. The treaty with the Seminoles was concluded March 21, 1866; that with the Creeks June 14 of that year. As before stated, it was, however, evidently the intention of the parties to the treaty of March, 1866, that the lands ceded to the Seminoles should be situated on the eastern portion of the domain, which it was believed would be ceded to the United States, for it is well known that negotiations were going on for a length of time between the commissioners on the part of the United States and the delegates of the Creek and Seminole Indians, and that the cession by the Creeks to the United States of the land granted to the Seminoles was agreed upon, and would be made when a treaty was concluded. Before, therefore, the actual location granted to the Seminoles, and which was to constitute their national domain, could be determined, it was necessary that the Creek dividing line should be established. This duty was devolved upon the Secretary of the Interior by the eighth article of the Creek treaty, the expenses to be paid by the United States, and an appropriation of $4,000 was made by Congress for this purpose July 28, 1866. (Stats. 14, page 430, third paragraph from top of page.)

At this time a large part of the Seminoles were homeless. During the war of the rebellion a portion of them had cast their fortunes with the South, and those declining to do so were refugees in Kansas, in the neighborhood of Neosho Falls, whence in the fall of 1865 they were removed to the west side of the Arkansas River, in Indian Territory, upon Cherokee lands. It had been found impracticable to remove them to their old homes in the Seminole country, for the reason that no supplies could be had there, and the long distance from Fort Gibson (about one hundred and sixty miles) to transport supplies, induced the Department to abandon the idea of settling them on their own domain, and to locate them for the time being near Fort Gibson, where Indian supplies were then delivered.

In September, 1866, the agent for the Seminoles reported that a considerable portion of the tribe had removed to their new homes, and that the remainder were preparing to emigrate that fall. In October the agent reported as follows:

"On my arrival here (Fort Gibson) I find this state of facts to exist: The Seminoles were living on Cherokee lands. They have raised small crops of corn and garden produce, which is now all gone. There is no game or meat nearer than their own country, one hundred and twenty-five miles from here. In their own country the few remaining cattle are being exhausted by the southern portion of the Seminoles. They are anxious to get home to save what few they may be able to secure. They wanted to get home so as to cut hay and prepare cabins for winter; and besides all this, the Cherokees are dissatisfied at their long stay on their lands and the using of their timber, when it was understood, when permission was given to camp on their lands, that the Seminoles were only to stay during last winter. They could not go without some assistance from the Government. Acting with the advice of Judge Harlan, agent for the Cherokees, and J. W. Dunn, agent for the Creeks, I have assumed the responsibility to attempt their removal. I have employed teams on my own credit, and will start them for home in a day or two. I shall provide transportation only for the sick, the children, and their household goods. What they will do for provisions at their homes, I cannot tell; but they are suffering here and cannot do worse in the Seminole country. I am aware that I have assumed considerable responsibility, but I know I have acted for the best interests of the Government and the Indians, and I hope I may be sustained."

A portion of the Seminoles thus removed themselves, and the remainder were removed by the Government, to what was supposed to be the country granted to them by treaty, before the boundaries of the land thus ceded had been marked. No appropriation had been made for the survey of this tract except the appropriation of $4,000 before referred to to survey the Creek dividing line, and this was found to be inadequate even for that purpose. In the meantime the necessity for the survey of the dividing line between the Creek lands ceded to the United States and those retained by the Creeks, as well as for the segregation of the 200,000 acres granted to the Seminoles, was urged by the Creek and Seminole agents, and in August, 1867, the Superintendent of Indian Affairs was instructed to have the dividing line surveyed if in his opinion the appropriation of $4,000 was sufficient to defray the expenses; if insufficient, that he should submit an estimate of the amount required.

After examination of the matter that officer reported that he was forced to the conclusion that there was a deficiency of information required to make the survey and especially a deficiency of means on hand to accomplish it, and submitted an estimate made by a practical surveyor, showing that a much larger amount was required than had been appropriated.

Afterward the superintendent was authorized to employ a competent surveyor to execute the survey of the Creek dividing line and the Seminole 200,000 acres tract; an additional estimate to be made to Congress and payment to be made as far as the existing appropriation of $4,000 would provide, the surveyor to rely upon the favorable action of Congress for the remainder. An additional appropriation of $5,000 was made March 3, 1869, to complete the survey of the dividing line and to survey the exterior boundary of the grant to the Seminoles, (Stats. 15, page 315.) The superintendent entered into contract with John C. Rankin to do the work. I am informed that his survey at first located the east boundary of the Seminole tract (and to that extent the Creek dividing line,) about seven miles east of the correct location of said line as afterward ascertained, and this survey was, therefore, not approved, and he was required to correct it.

This incorrect survey placed the eastern line of the Seminole tract approximately as shown in green on the map. As finally surveyed and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, July 15, 1872, the correct Creek dividing line is as shown in black on the map. The country between these two lines, embracing an area estimated at about one hundred and seventy-five thousand acres, had been settled upon and occupied by the Seminoles since the fall of 1866, the Indians believing themselves, and the Department believing them, to be upon the domain granted by the treaty, and having made for themselves homes and very valuable improvements.

When it became known that the Seminoles were occupying lands belonging to the Creeks, the latter protested against such occupancy. Disputes as to jurisdiction arose between the Creeks and Seminoles, the former contending that as the country was theirs they had jurisdiction over it, and the Seminoles refusing to recognize such jurisdiction over the tract occupied by them. The Department held that while the Creeks were not responsible for the inaccurate survey of the western boundary of their country, the Seminoles certainly should not be subjected to the experience of a jurisdiction to which they were averse and within which it was not designed in the treaty to place them, and the Creeks were accordingly notified that their claim to exercise jurisdiction over the Seminoles was not approved by the Department, and that any idea of attempting it should be abandoned.

By act of 3d March, 1873, (Stats. 17, page 626,) the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to negotiate with the Creeks for the relinquishment to the United States of the tract on which the Seminoles had been erroneously located. Under this authorization three attempts were made to effect a satisfactory adjustment of the matter. Soon after the passage of the act a committee, consisting of Enoch Hoag, one of the superintendents of Indian affairs, Thomas C. Jones, and John A. Milliken were deputed to negotiate with the Creeks and Seminoles for a final and permanent adjustment of their reservations.

They accomplished nothing. The Creeks were unwilling to lessen the area of their reserve, and refused to cede or sell, and demanded that the Seminoles should either become incorporated with them or remove from their land, neither of which the Seminoles would do, as they had been placed there by the Government and were unwilling again to break up their homes and establish new ones. This effort being fruitless of any satisfactory results, in 1875 Hon. J. P. C. Shanks was appointed a special commissioner, among other duties, to settle or attempt to settle the matter, the records of this office showing that he was authorized to offer the Creeks $1 per acre for the Seminole tract.

In October of that year, Mr. Shanks laid before the Creek council a proposition contemplating the cession by the Creeks to the United States, for the Seminoles, of the tract occupied by them, (estimated to contain one hundred and seventy-five thousand acres,) the United States to pay the Creeks $1 per acre, its true area to be ascertained by survey to be paid for by the United States.

The Creek council authorized a committee of five "to arrange and settle by treaty or otherwise all Creek interests with the United States Government." This committee proposed to Mr. Shanks to negotiate for the cession to the United States of the tract upon which the Seminoles were located, but they embraced in such negotiation an agreement on the part of Mr. Shanks to obligate the Government to bring to speedy settlement and payment a mass of claims alleged by them to be unsettled.

As the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, and the agent appointed under the act of 3d March, 1873, was specifically for the adjustment of the question of the location of the Seminoles, the proposition of the Creeks could not be entertained, and General Shanks so informed them. So that effort ended, except that after Mr. Shanks's arrival in Washington he was informed by a letter from the Creek principal chief that the Creek council had authorized a commission of thirteen to negotiate for the sale of the Seminole tract upon such terms "as will give the best satisfaction to the Muscogee people," and directing the commission to "report their negotiations to the next annual session of the national council for its approval or rejection."

Matters rested thus until November, 1876, when the third effort was made by sending Mr. S. A. Galpin as a special agent to negotiate. He made no report.

I am now informed by letter from the Department, dated 12th instant, that the Creek delegation resident in this city have signified their willingness to sell to the United States 175,000 acres of their land lying east of the "division line" for the use of the Seminoles, at the rate of $1 per acre in settlement of all differences and demands on or against the United States growing out of the question of the Seminole occupation thereof.

In view of the fact that the tract of country in question is understood to embrace among the most valuable lands in the Creek reserve, and that the Creeks have been deprived of its use for more than fifteen years in consequence of the location of the Seminoles on it by the agent of the Government, I regard the price named as a just basis for settlement, and therefore respectfully recommend that Congress be requested to insert in one of the appropriation bills yet to be acted on at the present session an item of appropriation in the sum of $175,000 for the payment to the Creeks, at $1 per acre, for 175,000 acres of land lying east of the dividing line and between the Canadian River and the North Fork of Canadian River for the use of the Seminoles, and an additional item of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to survey the out boundaries of the tracts so purchased. To this end I submit a draught of items, as above indicated.

As shown in the foregoing, the homeless condition of the Seminoles, and their unwelcome occupation of lands belonging to another tribe, as well as the necessity of settling them somewhere as soon as possible, in order to enable them to commence to support their families, led the Government to locate them on what at the time was supposed to be the land that would inure to them when the "dividing line" should be surveyed, but which, upon the correct survey of that line, was found to be included in the Creek reserve. That they were thus erroneously located is, under the circumstances, not to be wondered at; but certainly it was through no fault of the Seminoles, and the Government should therefore pay the Creeks for the lands sought to be purchased, and should also meet the expense of the survey thereof. The Seminoles certainly should not be required to do this, especially when it is considered that they received only fifteen cents an acre for the country relinquished by them in the treaty of 1866, while the United States paid the Creeks thirty cents per acre for the half of their domain ceded to the United States, and then charged the Seminoles fifty cents an acre for the part of the same land sold to them, and only after the lapse of nine years made up to them the difference in price.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOS. M. NICHOL, Acting Commissioner.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, March 1, 1881.

SIR: The accompanying map indicates the lands selected and those occupied by the Seminoles in the Indian Territory.

The dark line running north and south represents the dividing line between the Creek reservation and their ceded lands, and the tract marked in green pencil lines denotes the lands now occupied by the Seminoles, while that in blue lines immediately west indicates the two-hundred-thousand-acre tract purchased for them under the treaty.

Very respectfully,

A. BELL, Assistant Secretary.

Hon. HENRY G. DAVIS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, after line 1424, to insert:

That from the funds on hand and belonging to the Peoria, Wea, Kaskasia, and Piankeshaw Indians there is hereby appropriated the sum of $500, the same to be immediately available; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay the same over to the delegation of Indians now or recently in Washington, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of said delegation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1437, to insert:

MISCELLANEOUS OBJECTS UNDER THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

For the purchase and distribution of seeds, under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to settlers on the public lands in the new States and Territories whose crops were destroyed during the past year by drought and grasshoppers, $20,000.

For the purcase of plates and manuscript, from Professor Townend Glover, on the insects of America, $7,500.

Mr. BECK. We desire to add after the word "dollars," in line 1444, at the end of the first item, "to be immediately available."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to this modification? The Chair hears none, and it will be made.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after "Attorney-General," in line 1469, to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty;" so as to make the clause read:

Defending suits in claims against the United States: For defraying the necessary expenses incurred in the examination of witnesses and procuring of evidence in the matter of claims against the United States and the District of Columbia pending in any Department, and for necessary expenses incurred in defending suits in the Court of Claims, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1523, after the word "law," to insert "to hold a circuit or district court;" so as to read:

For expenses and fees of bailiffs, furniture, for payment of expenses of district judges who may be sent out of their districts in pursuance of law to hold a circuit or district court, and for other miscellaneous expenses, $325,000; in all, $2,950,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 1526, to insert:

And so much of section 596 of the Revised Statutes as forbids the payment of the expenses of district judges while holding court outside of their districts is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "public printing and binding," after line 1580, to insert:

For printing an edition of 5,000 copies of the first volume of the report of the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard in 1874, $4,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I offer an amendment to the amendment of the committee distributing the volumes authorized to be published:

Two thousand copies for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

There is no distribution in the committee's amendment.

Mr. BECK. That is an improvement on our amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill to the end of line 1586.

Mr. BECK. In line 1586, after the words "for commissioners, not exceeding three in number," the committee instruct me to offer an amendment, which is omitted in the printed bill, in the words "to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" so that it shall read:

For commissioners, not exceeding three in number, (to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate,) to represent the United States at a conference, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1592, after the word "each," to insert "and for a secretary to said commissioners, the sum of $3,000;" and in line 1594, after the word "State," to strike out "and for a secretary to each of such commissioners, the sum of $3,000;" so as to make the clause read:

For commissioners, not exceeding three in number, (to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate,) to represent the United States at a conference to be called to adopt a common ratio between gold and silver, for the purpose of establishing internationally the use of bimetallic money and securing fixity of relative value between those metals, the sum of $5,000 each, and for a secretary to said commissioners the sum of $3,000, and their reasonable expenses, to be approved by the Secretary of State; the amount necessary to pay such compensation and expenses to be immediately available out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1607, to insert:

For contribution to maintenance of International Bureau of Weights and Measures for the calendar year 1881, in conformity with terms of convention signed May 20, 1875, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, $2,270, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1614, to insert:

To pay the necessary expenses of the French and American claims commission, provided for by the act approved June 16, 1880, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1618, to insert.

SENATE.

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay for preparing the index to private claims, under the resolution of June 16, 1880, directing him to prepare an alphabetical list of all private claims which have been before the Senate, with the action of the Senate thereon, since the 3d day of March, 1867, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1626, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay Francis E. Shober, Chief Clerk of the Senate, for preparing, under a resolution of the Senate of the 16th of June, 1879, a new edition of the Manual, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1631, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay George W. Harrison additional for services as assistant clerk to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, $400.

The amendment was agreed to,

Mr. MAXEY. The amendment beginning on line 1620 was passed without my notice though I was endeavoring to keep here up with the reading. I desire to offer an amendment to that.

I call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to the amendment offered beginning on line 1620 to line 1626. The object of that amendment is "to enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay for preparing the index to private claims, under the resolution of June 16, 1880, directing him to prepare an alphabetical list of all private claims," &c. It appropriates $2,500 for this service. Precisely like work was ordered for six Congresses beginning with the Thirty-fourth and ending with the Thirty-ninth, for which the Government paid $7,000. This covers six Congresses and the first and second sessions of the present Congress, covering a period when there have been in my judgment, and I think the present occupant of the chair as chairman of the Committee on Claims will indorse it, more private claims presented than ever before. It is a necessity to every committee that there should be this history of private claims in order to protect the committees from imposition. The work has been as the Secretary of the Senate certifies correctly and well done, and he wants $4,250 to pay for it.

Mr. BECK. Will not the Senator from Texas allow us to pass over that until uncontested amendments are disposed of?

Mr. MAXEY. I can see no reason why $7,000 should be allowed for less work, less Congresses, and only $2,500 for more Congresses covering far more work.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator will allow us to pass over this we shall come back to it, and I will consider what the Senator has to suggest.

Mr. MAXEY. I want what is fair to these clerks who are competent men and worked during the two months they were entitled by law to a recess, and I think they are fairly entitled to pay for this work which is of great value to us. I give notice that I shall move——

Mr. VEST. I have an amendment to offer to that clause.

Mr. MAXEY. I simply want to give notice that I shall move to make it correspond to the estimate made by the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. BECK. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is in language that will accomplish the purpose. Let the whole question be reserved for a vote hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment from lines 1620 to 1626 will be regarded as not having been acted on and will be reserved for a separate vote hereafter.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 1635, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay the person in charge of the Senate telephone, from January 14 to June 30, 1881, at the rate of $720 per annum, $334.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1640, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to all committee clerks, pages, and other employés of the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, and who shall be so employed at the adjournment of this Congress, who do not now receive annual salaries, a sum equal to thirty days' pay at their present rate of compensation, as extra pay; and an amount sufficient to pay the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwize appropriated, and shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I offer the following amendment to come in immediately after line 1650:

That the Secretary of the Senate be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the widow of M. H. CARPENTER, deceased, late Senator from the State of Wisconsin, the sum of $5,466.70, the amount of compensation of a Senator and mileage from February 25, 1881, to March 4, 1882.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "House of Representatives," to strike out from line 1657 to line 1662, as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to the officers and employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual roll on the 1st day of July, 1880, one month's extra pay at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill to line 1665.

Mr. BECK. On line 1665 the name ought to be "Diemar." The spelling ought to be corrected. It is "Demars" in the printed bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out from line 1724 to line 1728, as follows:

That the sum of $1,500 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, in addition to the sums heretofore appropriated in this bill, respectively, to Noble A. Hull, Horatio Bisbee, Ignatius Donnelly, and W. D. Washburn.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have no objection to the item of appropriation for Godlove S. Orth, in line 1705; but I should like to know why Mr. McCabe is not paid for his expenses in that election contest. If Mr. Orth ought to be paid his expenses in that contest, I think his contestant, Mr. McCabe, ought to be. Was the attention of the committee of the Senate called to that matter?

Mr. BECK. Not to that particular subject; but this was the dealing of the House with its own affairs; and as we do not admit the right of the House to deal with anything that we see fit to do relative to our own affairs, we did not assume that we had the right to do anything with regard to theirs; but the provision in lines 1724 to 1728, at the request of many members of the House, we propose to strike out, so as to give the House again jurisdiction of the question involved there, and if they find that they have made any mistake, they can correct it under that amendment, which the committee propose at their request.

Mr. CALL. I hope the amendment of the committee will not be adopted. The honorable Senator from Kentucky who has charge of this bill has just made a very frank admission to the Senate. He says that he thought and the committee thought that the Senate had no right to interfere with the expenses allowed by the House in the management of their own internal affairs, their own contested cases. He also said that the committee have listened to individual members of the House of Representatives, asking that this committee shall nullify and set aside the formal action of the House of Representatives upon a bill passed in due form of law. I apprehend that this is not only erroneous but it is a method of legislation to be condemned in the most positive terms.

Now, in regard to the merits of the proposition. This bill allows $8,000 in the case of Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, and Seth H. Yocum; it allows in the case of Jesse J. Yeates and J. J. Martin $2,000, and an additional $250; it allows in another case $4,000; and yet in this case but $3,500 was allowed to the contestants, Noble A. Hull, Horatio Bisbee, Ignatius Donnelly, and W. D. Washburn.

The committee of the Senate, as the Senator from Kentucky says, upon the statement, the informal statement of individual members, who doubtless opposed this allowance in the House, undertook, without evidence as to the merits of the case, without any knowledge of the propriety of the action of the majority of the House of Representatives, to set aside the action of the House, not because it is vicious or improper legislation, but upon the statement of individual members that they objected to it, and desired this committee to do it in order that the House might again consider the subject.

I apprehend that there is no foundation for the action of this committee. The bill shows that amounts much larger have been allowed in various other cases, even so far back as the Thirty-eighth Congress, and there is not a particle of evidence before this committee, as has been stated by the Senator from Kentucky in charge of the bill, that this allowance was in any respect improper or excessive. I therefore hope, as a matter of precedent, as a matter of principle, and as a matter of justice in individual cases, that the action of the committee will not be concurred in.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the speech of the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] only illustrates the importance of a man knowing what he is going to talk about before he says it. This was stricken out at the express request of members of the House, and at the request of the Committee on Appropriations themselves, who desired, because they had not done justice to some other men, to add others to this list, for this is the clause giving them additional compensation, and they thought that two or three more were meritorious, but they could not insert them. It is not desired to cut down any of the men here provided for, but to allow the correction of mistakes in the case of others, so that if they see fit in their judgment they may add others. All the criticism made on the committee by the Senator from Florida is not only wholly unnecessary but it is against exactly what he wants to accomplish.

Mr. GARLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky if the attention of the committee was called to the case of Mr. SLEMONS, who had a long contest in the House? It is not mentioned here.

Mr. BECK. It was not at the time, but it has been since, and this opening of the question leaves it open for the House to provide for him.

Mr. GARLAND. He cannot get anything under the clause now.

Mr. BECK. No, but he may be brought in, and so may the friend of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] in the case which he made out, which was a good case.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand that in the deficiency bill the matter to which the Senator from Kentucky refers can be considered by the House.

Mr. BECK. It can be on this bill, and the sole object of the Senate committee was to give the House a chance at it. We moved the amendment to comply with the request of the Senator from Arkansas, the Senator from South Carolina, and others, and of gentlemen of the House of Representatives, who wish to have this matter further considered there to allow the insertion of other names.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that, and so the action of the House can be had.

Mr. BECK. It can; and the striking out is for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In addition to what my colleague on the committee has said, let me say that the object is to give the House jurisdiction.

Mr. BUTLER. So I understand.

Mr. CALL. The honorable Senator from Kentucky may be right that a private arrangement between the Senators may control the action of the two Houses of Congress; but I do not agree to it. I am not advised what conference has been had between the honorable Senator and the members of this committee and the members of the other House. I did not know that there had been an arrangement that the will of the majority should be set aside and a new arrangement made, nor do I understand that it is either competent or right to conduct the business of the Senate and the House in that method. The intention was correct, but I still assert that, not having the advantage of that private information which seems to exist between the two committees, my action was entirely proper. I knew that this was a meritorious case, and I did not know that the necessary forms of law for the passage of a bill, which have been acted on by either the Senate or the House, were to be set aside by a private conference between members of the Committee on Appropriations of the House and the Senate in order that they might do that which they could properly do in other and better modes.

Mr. BECK. It is not for that purpose at all. There was no private action.

Mr. CALL. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. BECK. If you send this back to the House, the House itself, when the Senate has stricken out the clause, can agree to amend it. It is not a matter of private conference, but a public act publicly done. If the Senator from Florida does not understand it, it is his misfortune and not our fault.

Mr. CALL. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, the bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in acccordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the Secretary will notify the Printer to have this bill printed as early as possible.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. BAYARD, Mr. BOOTH, Mr. COCKRELL, Mr. COKE, Mr. JONAS, Mr. LOGAN, Mr. PADDOCK, Mr. SAUNDERS, and Mr. VOORHEES submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ERRORS IN AN ENROLLED BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the Joint Committee on Enrolled Bills to make certain changes in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Joint Committee on Enrolled Bills be, and the said committee is hereby, authorized to direct a change of enrollment of the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, so that the item appropriating $10,000 for the Little Red River, in Arkansas, shall be stricken out, and the word "the" in the item in relation to the Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company be substituted for the word "those;" the first of said changes being necessary to correct a clerical error in the conference report on said bill, and the second correction being necessary to correct a clerical error in a Senate amendment thereto.

Mr. RANSOM. I ask the concurrence of the Senate in the resolution.

The resolution was concurred in.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to offer the following as an additional section to the bill——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky consent to the amendment being acted on now?

Mr. BAYARD. The amendment has been submitted to the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. BECK. This may as well be acted on now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert as an additional section:

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds: Provided, That the bonds so purchased or redeemed shall constitute no part of the sinking fund, but shall be canceled.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to inquire of the Senator if that applies to all the different character of bonds, the fours, four-and-a-halfs, fives, and sixes?

Mr. BAYARD. It will apply to any bonds which it is optional with the Government to pay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. By law now the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to buy the amount required by the sinking fund. This will authorize him to buy 5 and 6 per cent. bonds which are redeemable at the option of the Government.

Mr. McDONALD. Ought it not be limited to the purchasing of those bonds?

Mr. BAYARD. Without this law he cannot purchase beyond the requirements of the sinking fund.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire if the Senate is through considering the committee amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Committee on Appropriations are not through. The next question will be on the reserved amendment on page 23, from line 543 to line 547, the amendment which was reserved at the instance of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] The question is, Will the Senate agree to that amendment?

Mr. CONKLING. What is that amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 542 the Committee on Appropriations propose to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse the President for amount paid for expenses of the commission appointed to go to Louisiana in April, 1877, $3,950.73.

Mr. BECK. On the 9th of February, 1881, Hon. John Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, sent to the Senate the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 9, 1881.

SIR: I have to inclose herewith, for the consideration of your committee, copy of a letter and accompanying statement addressed on the 8th instant to the chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations in relation to an appropriation to reimburse the President for the amount paid by him in defraying the expenses of the commission appointed to go to Louisiana.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary.

HON. H. G. DAVIS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

The next letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 8, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to call the attention of your committee to an estimate submitted by this Department in December, 1878, (see Book of Estimates, page 158,) for $6,000 for expenses and compensation of the commission appointed by the President to go to Louisiana, and in connection therewith to state that since that time the President has paid the amount advanced by the First National Bank of New York City for this purpose.

I have therefore to recommend that an appropriation be made to reimburse the President, and inclose for the information of your committee a statement of expenses of this commission, amounting to $3,950.73, on which has accrued to January 1, 1881, $885.83 as interest.

Very respectfully

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary.

Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

The itemized statement I do not suppose it is necessary to read, but it foots up actual expenses paid by the President $3,950.73, interest $885.83, total $4,836.56.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ask for the items.

Mr. BECK. I suppose I may as well give them.

Amount required to be appropriated	4,836 56

Mr. McPHERSON. And who were the commissioners?

Mr. BECK. The Senator knows the names of them as well as I do; they are all known. We recommend the reimbursement of the actual amount paid, $3,950.73, allowing, of course, no interest. The money was paid by the President. No matter what question there may have been in regard to the matter originally, it seems to me if the Executive thought the Louisiana question should be looked at in this way, and sent these men, we ought to foot the bill.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator from Kentucky if he knows of any law that justifies this appropriation. I believe as a general rule appropriations should be in pursuance of some law. Is there any law for this?

Mr. BECK. I know of no law for it. I know that we have sent cargoes of ships all over the world to inquire about things. Congress is a great court of equity to do justice where it is proper. I endeavored to defeat Mr. Hayes as hard as any man in the Senate, to the extent of my ability. Commissioners were appointed, and a Congress of which I was not a member determined that he was legally elected President, and he was sworn in, and we have all submitted. When I could not defeat him, I do not propose to take vengeance on him now by taking this little sum of money away from him, nor to stick pins in him when I cannot keep him out of the White House.

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish to ask the Senator from Kentucky was this commission sent to ascertain what was the legal Legislature of Louisiana? There were so many commissions and committees sent to Louisiana that it is hard to keep track of them.

Mr. BECK. There is not a man in the Senate who does not know that whole history as well as I do. I am not going into any political argument about it. I merely say that these men were sent; the President paid the money which covered their expenses. I think he ought to be repaid. I shall vote to repay him. It is not my way of making a political contest to refuse to reimburse him for doing what as President of the United States he thought was a right thing for him to do.

Mr. VOORHEES. I thank the Senator from Kentucky for stating the facts. He says every other Senator knows as well about this as he does. I am sure I do not. How can I? There have been many things in Louisiana and more money has been spent by the Federal Government on that tract of land than any other spot on the face of the globe. In the many visitings, winings, and dinings of committees and commissions, I wanted to inquire of the gentleman having this in charge whereabouts this commission came in. I was not seeking to embarrass the Senator from Kentucky at all, nor have I any unkind feelings toward anybody, not even the President; but I want to know just what we were to pay this money for.

Mr. BECK. I have only to say that I will not be a party to bringing on any political discussion. The 4th of March comes on Friday. This Congress expires at twelve o'clock on that day. This bill must reach the House to-day or it is lost, and I would rather have the amendment voted out than to do anything that would prolong discussion now.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am done.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the honorable Senator from Kentucky tell me whether application had ever been made by the Secretary of the Treasury or the so-called President of the United States for the reimbursement of this fund previous to this time?

Mr. BECK. Yes, it has been discussed before; it has been in the Book of Estimates before; and has been refused before.

Mr. McPHERSON. It is I see for money expended by a commission in 1877, I suppose for the purpose of making good a title somewhat in doubt. I wish to ask the Senator another question. Being a member of the Committee on Appropriations I know he is conversant with the fact that application has been made for the payment of this money heretofore and the Committee on Appropriations have rejected the claim, if not it has been uniformly rejected by the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Both.

Mr. McPHERSON. Both by the committee and the Senate, I hear from two sources.

Mr. CONKLING. And the House.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then I should like to know what new testimony there is bearing upon this question that has convinced the members of the committee that it is to-day a just and proper claim. The honorable Senator declines to give me the information.

Mr. BECK. I do not decline to give any information. It was brought up before, when perhaps there was more political feeling and more temper than there exists at present; I do not know whether it was so or not. If the cases that are rejected by one Congress were not proper to be presented to another, there would be a great many claims that are now pending and being pressed every session, and by the Senator from New Jersey perhaps, that would be turned out very unceremoniously. It is for the Senate to determine. If it is not a good claim, vote it down, and let it go out of the bill. If it is, vote it in. The facts are known absolutely well to all of us.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, I for one have been in the habit of following the honorable committee in this Chamber, believing their judgment to be best in the matters which they have investigated and reported to the Senate with their recommendations. The recommendation is that we should vote an appropriation of three thousand nine hundred and odd dollars to give to Mr. Hayes for the purpose, if I understand the Senator, of defending his title to the Presidency, for the purpose of making it appear plain that Mr. Hayes was entitled to his seat, about which many of us have always been in doubt. I for one have never had any doubt upon that question.

Mr. President, I am not disposed to follow the committee in this matter. I am not disposed to take $3,900 out of the United States Treasury for the purpose of assisting Mr. Hayes to hold a position which, in my opinion, he never was entitled to hold.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand the Senator from New Jersey to assert that this commission was sent to New Orleans in order to secure to Mr. Hayes the title to the Presidency. Do I understand the Senator aright?

Mr. McPHERSON. I understand that they were sent there for the purpose of securing proof as to what had been done previous to that time in order to sustain his position, validate it, so to speak, by supporting proofs.

Mr. BAILEY. That would be new to the country; it would certainly be new to me. I understand that the title of Mr. Hayes to the Presidency was declared by a commission appointed by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States, and that his title to the office rested upon the judgment and decision of that commission; that he was inaugurated because the commission by a majority declared that he had been elected in the November preceding. I do not understand that the commission which was sent to New Orleans in the spring of 1877, more than thirty days after Mr. Hayes had been inaugurated and had taken the oath of office, and when he was quietly and securely seated in the presidential chair, had anything whatever to do with securing to him the title to that place.

Mr. McPHERSON. Why were they sent?

Mr. BAILEY. The gentlemen composing that commission were sent as I understand for the purpose of inquiring into the actual condition of affairs in the State of Louisiana. There were two legislatures then actually sitting in the city of New Orleans, the capital city of the State. There were two persons claiming to be governor of the State. Each had appealed to the President of the United States under the act of Congress for assistance in asserting his authority. Each of these governors declared the other to be acting in opposition to the lawful authority of the State. Each of these legislatures asserted for itself legitimate authority and denied it to the other. For the purpose of informing the Chief Executive, who had been appealed to by both parties, the President sent some of the most distinguished men in the country to Louisiana, for the purpose of ascertaining the actual condition of affairs and requesting them to make a report to him of the facts.

The commission went to Louisiana and by its policy, and approving the measures it adopted, the President succeeded in quieting the State and in adjusting and settling the differences that existed there. The expenses of that commission were paid by the President out of his own pocket. It does seem to me that it is due from the Congress of the United States that these expenses should be refunded. Did he have any greater personal interest in that question than the Senator from New Jersey? In what did the interest consist? He was in public life; the Senator from New Jersey then was in public life. The President, however, as the chief executive officer, felt himself constrained to inquire into the actual condition of affairs. Not trusting to newspaper reports or to the reports made by partisans, he requested gentlemen of the greatest distinction, in whom the whole country had confidence, to inquire into the actual condition of affairs and to make a report. I understand that they did the work assigned to them, and did it well; they succeeded in quieting the State of Louisiana, and quiet has reigned there from that day to this.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the honorable Senator name me the gentlemen who were sent there as this commission?

Mr. BAILEY. John C. Brown, of my own State, was one; Wayne MacVeagh, of the State of Pennsylvania, who it is said will in a few days be a Cabinet officer of the President-elect, was another. I do not remember all their names. I remember, though, that the country had confidence in these men.

Mr. McPHERSON. A commission, if I remember aright, if distinguished for anything, distinguished for their partisanship, was the commission that President Hayes instructed to learn the true condition of affairs in the South.

Mr. BAILEY. MacVeagh, as I understand, is a republican, and certainly is expected to be a Cabinet officer in the incoming administration. John C. Brown, of my own State, is a democrat. Mr. Justice Harlan, I understand always to have been a republican, and he has since been nominated by the President to be an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and his nomination was confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. President, I believe that the action of the President in sending this commission was a patriotic action. I believe that he was controlled by a desire to bring peace and repose to the country. His action certainly contributed in a great degree to settling the differences that for so long a time had kept Louisiana in a state of ferment, and gave great satisfaction to the nation.

Mr. Hayes's administration has been sometimes sneered at, sometimes scoffed at, but before I leave the Senate I wish to put it upon the record that in my opinion we have had for forty years past no administration that has been so beneficent to the country as the one that is about to expire. You may call it a weak administration if you will; call it by what name you please, but at last it has brought good and only good to the people of the United States. Mr. Hayes has done much that I do not approve. Many of his recommendations to Congress, in my opinion, have been unwise and in conflict with the principles of the Constitution; still I believe he has been animated by a sincere desire to bring peace and repose to the country, and his efforts have not been without success. Contrast our condition to-day with our condition four years ago. How great the change! Although we are indebted to a kind Providence that has rewarded our labors with bounteous crops, and thereby wrought a revolution in foreign as well as internal commerce, yet at last we could not have reaped the harvest of these great opportunities but for the wise, considerate, moderate, and patriotic efforts of our Chief Magistrate to bring peace and quiet to the country.

I trust that the amendment reported by the committee may be adopted.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAILEY] in giving the history of this commission, this beneficent commission as he considers it, I think made some mistakes in stating its history. I understood him to say that the President sent this commission to Louisiana in response to requests from both factions claiming to be the government of the State of Louisiana, asking him for his assistance, and asking him to maintain and support them as the true government of the State.

I desire to say that so far as the government was concerned which has been recognized as the government of Louisiana, and which has been ever since so recognized by the people of that State, and of the Union, that they never made any appeal to Mr. Hayes for assistance or for any other recognition than that which he was bound to give as the President of the United States to the proper State government existing in Louisiana. They did not ask for troops; they did not ask him to put down the opposing government, if one existed, in the State of Louisiana. Mr. Hayes came into office with a doubtful title. He was in a condition to make war upon no one; he was in a condition to have no extra trouble or controversy upon his hands, and for his own purposes which he himself thought best he sent these gentlemen to Louisiana. I was there at the time. I was a member of the Legislature, and I met this commission. I saw all their workings and all their movements, and I am unable to say, as the Senator from Tennessee has said, what they came there for, or what good their coming effected. I feel great respect for all the gentlemen composing that commission. I think one of them, our honored and esteemed friend, Governor BROWN, felt himself very much out of place, and that he was at some loss to know what to do, or what he had been commissioned to do. It was a roving commission sent by the President to ascertain what he himself should do, to support and maintain himself and to promote his own interests. It was a commission sent to Louisiana to ascertain whether the government which existed in a shell (the Packard government, which had no power or influence whatever, which was shut up and inclosed in one single building, the State-house) had power enough to sustain itself, and whether if recognized by the President it could be maintained as the government of Louisiana.

When that commission arrived in New Orleans they found this pretended government on its last legs, if it had ever existed; that its legislature had gone to pieces; that its governor had abandoned it and gone to Washington; that it was recognized in no part of the State of Louisiana and had no power or authority whatsoever. They found the control of the true State government of Louisiana was fully established, respected by the people and its authority obeyed throughout the length and breadth of the State. They found the governor installed in office; they found the Legislature engaged in passing laws which were obeyed by the people and enforced by the courts. They found the government of Louisiana firmly established in every department, the supreme court and the inferior courts in session, and rendering decisions, passing upon the rights of citizens and of property, and upon the laws which were being enacted, and all receiving the almost unanimous support of the people.

I presume the commissioners reported to Mr. Hayes that there was but one government in Louisiana, and that government could not be subverted except by the use of the Federal Army.

I admit that no government could have existed in Louisiana at war with the National Government, or which had desired to be so; but the experience of a preceding administration in subverting a government erected and installed by the people of Louisiana had not been sufficiently approved by the people of the United States as to authorize Mr. Hayes, with his doubtful title, to repeat the experiment. Upon receiving the report of his commissioners that there was but one actual government in Louisiana he recognized that government, as he was compelled by circumstances to do.

I think we have paid enough of the debts of Mr. Hayes. He has paid his debt to Mr. Packard by sending him abroad and appointing him consul at Liverpool. He has paid his debt to the members of the returning board which counted him in and made him President by bestowing upon them all lucrative offices. I wonder that he had not asked, in addition to the payment of the sum now under consideration, for an additional appropriation to repay to him the thousand dollars which he had been compelled to advance to Mr. Cazenave, of returning-board notoriety. I think we have paid enough of the debts of Mr. Hayes. He has been in the enjoyment of a salary which many of us believed never rightfully belonged to him.

These commissioners were his agents. They were not asked for by the people of Louisiana; they were authorized by no act of Congress; they did no good; they affected no public sentiment. The result was achieved by the people of Louisiana, and not by the efforts of Mr. Hayes and his commission. I think Mr. Hayes should pay his own agents, and that Congress has nothing to do with refunding him the money which he may have expended.

Mr. HEREFORD. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky at whose instance that item was inserted in the bill? Who appeared before the committee, by letter or otherwise, and furnished the committee with the items that aggregate the amount that is in the amendment? I know that the Senator from Kentucky is very rigid in his application of the rules on this subject, and that he would require proofs that this money had been paid by the President of the United States. I should like to know who appeared before the committee, by letter or otherwise, and asked for this appropriation. Who furnished the proof that this money had ever been paid by Mr. Hayes? And I wish to know if the Senator is satisfied of the fact that Mr. Hayes has ever paid out one dollar of it.

Mr. BECK. The Secretary of the Treasury, in the communication which I read, and in person, appeared before the committee. The itemized account I have also read in the last ten minutes. I have not a doubt that the President paid the money. It has been estimated for in the Books of Estimates, and it has been before the committees heretofore. The question simply is, will Congress as a court of equity, or call it what you like, give it? All I ask is a vote. I do not care whether you give it or not. The committee thought that it was a proper thing to submit to the consideration of the Senate. If the Senate says, "do not pay it," strike out the clause and refuse to concur with the committee; but do something. I expressed my individual opinion a few minutes ago that as the President had paid it and as in April, 1877, a month after he was inaugurated he had sent men down there to ascertain the condition of affairs, and, as I thought, about the only good that the democratic party (if we are going into politics) ever got out of any investigation, was the declaration of the fact we always asserted that the men we claimed to be duly elected were in fact the true Legislature and the true governor, and that the men who had been holding high offices, and some of them holding them now, were holding their places under no sort of authority, I am willing to pay the $4,000 to develop the truth of that fact, because the President paid it; but if the Senate think otherwise, let it go.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, this amendment addresses itself to me as an appeal to sympathy. The First National Bank is located in the State of New York, and I cannot but feel the interest, not to say the tenderness, which naturally exists between a representative and his constituents; and when I reflect upon the hard and frugal road that bank has been compelled to tread, and then contemplate the idea of its losing such a sum of money, the possibility is one I cannot calmly contemplate. It requires more fortitude to inflict such an injury than I possess.

If I turn to the idea of allowing the President of the United States to take out of his meager compensation a sum like this to defray the expenses of five tourists, called in the amendment commissioners, it might make an appeal which I must be hard-hearted to resist.

When we think of these five gentlemen, all of whose names appear in this sometimes sumptuous bill of part culars, which fails to amount to the $6,000 originally estimated, but which still does amount to a considerable sum—when we think of their defraying such expenses, unrewarded, and unrecognized as they are, we must be stingy indeed, particularly when voting the money of other people, to be willing to consent to such cruelty.

The distinguished citizen of Tennessee and one other, are not like the rest of these gentlemen in the rewards which have waited upon them. They are also not like the many other persons of whom we have heard so much in Louisiana, useful, handy and active as they were in services rendered about this complicated matter. They, the legion to whom I now refer, as I have heard the honorable Senator from Kentucky sometimes relate to the Senate, are enjoying a grand total of the annual salaries paid to them in official places held I think I have heard the honorable Senator say as rewards for the peculiar services they rendered.

As to all the citizens upon whom these expenses might fall, the amendment comes as an urgent appeal to sympathy, and yet I shall not be able to discuss it without vexing the ear of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, who does not wish to listen to a political discussion. I do not wish to engage in it or to listen to it, and yet if the amendment is to be adhered to I shall deem it my duty to enter into a political discussion so far as such discussion is needed to solve the question of the propriety of making an appropriation, worse than unlawful, as I believe it is.

The House of Representatives, in this bill and in other bills, has decided not to make it. The House of Representatives has repeatedly refused to make it. With the facts all before it the House has repeatedly refused to pay the money. The committee of this body has chosen by importing an amendment into the bill to invite the Senate to consider it, and the Senator from Kentucky says that Friday is the beginning of a new administration and the day on which this session will cease. I know all this, and I want this bill in every defensible part of it to become a law.

I submit, however, to the honorable Senator from Kentucky that if he would save time he ought not to come here with a provision that has been repeatedly discussed in the Senate, which has never succeeded in winning even an informal vote in its favor, but has over and over again been reported against, and over and over again voted down on the yeas and nays in the Senate, and which does involve political discussion, which does involve the question whether gentlemen requested to go, as tourists, not as commissioners, without law, and as I believe against law, and requested to do an errand not tolerated either by the Constitution or by any law which obeys it, whether they are to be paid under the guise of expenses to them, or upon the allegation—I choose that word because I wish not to be disrespectful—that the President has paid this money out of his own pocket, if I caught aright the expression of a Senator.

I say the Senator from Kentucky ought not to bring such a question here, if he does not wish it to be discussed and discussed at length. I ask that Senator to treat this amendment as he has treated other amendments, and spare himself and the Senate the infliction of the debate which is certain to occcur if this amendment is persisted in. It involves not the $3,000 or the $4,000, not the item of this bill of particulars insignificant as they are to all of these gentlemen, whether now holding official stations or whether, as the Senator remarked as to one of them, about to cross the threshold of distinguished official place; it involves a principle much beyond that and much more considerable than this sum of money.

I hope the honorable Senator from Kentucky will allow this cup to pass from us, and be content with the fact that this very body as now constituted, not those who went before us but consisting of those now assembled, has again and again passed upon it. If the Senator will accept the fact, I for one will relieve him; but if he will not, and wants to litigate this matter afresh then I submit he ought not to complain of any debate.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from New York allow me to interrupt him? Of course, I desire to close the debate. I care nothing about this item one way or the other. I hope the Senator will move to lay it on the table. I shall vote against laying it on the table because my committee has instructed me to report the amendment. If it is laid on the table, however, that ends it.

Mr. CONKLING. But my honorable friend will observe that a motion to lay on the table not only cuts off debate but brings the Senate to vote upon the merits of this amendment as those merits have been stated by those who favor it.

Mr. BECK. If the amendment is laid upon the table that ends it.

Mr. CONKLING. If laid upon the table that is the end of it, and if the Senator can assure me that such a motion will prevail I will gladly forego any discussion.

Mr. BECK. No; if it is not laid on the table it will be still open to discussion.

Mr. CONKLING. I am aware of that, but still I would not like to take the sense of the Senate after what has been said, without the Senate having brought back to its recollection and attention at least some of the circumstances which surrounded this transaction, without having read the papers which constituted the open, public, and ostensible object of this embassy.

All that will take some time, and time should be given to it,—as little time as possible; but I do not wish to go into it unless the Senator from Kentucky feels called upon to insist upon his amendment. If he will let us take the bill as the House sent it to us and rest upon the fact that over and over again this question has been passed upon both in committee and in the Senate, I shall be glad to leave it there; but if he will not, then I do not see but all those who feel as I feel that this claim ought to be not only defeated but discussed sufficiently to display its merits, must proceed in that course.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. BECK. If I have the floor, I will move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. THURMAN. Not yet, I hope.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator renew it if I do?

Mr. THURMAN. Oh, yes; and vote for it, too.

Mr. BECK. I want a vote; that is all. I will vote against my own motion, but I insist upon the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator not withdraw the motion? I will renew it.

Mr. BECK. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator withdraw the motion?

Mr. BECK. If the Senator will renew it.

Mr. THURMAN. I will renew it, because I want to adjourn this fight over to the next Congress. I want my friend from New York to meet my successor, a member of Mr. Hayes's Cabinet, under which what my friend from New York thinks was a great crime was perpetrated. I want him to meet my successor face to face, and discuss the propriety of this thing with him, not with me. I want him to meet the new Attorney-General, who was one of these commissioners, and who was said to have had most persuasive eloquence in getting out the Packard legislature, who, by the way, were cooped up in a house and had not a particle of jurisdiction. I want him to come to this contest with some foes worthy of his steel. He has nobody here now to battle with him. The Senator from Kentucky has shown the white feather and run at the first fire. I do not feel called upon to defend this Administration or its ways, or the way that it got into power. I do not do that, but my successor is able to do it.

I say, therefore, to the Senator from New York, as the preux chevalier, as a man ready to put his lance in rest against any foe that sounds his trumpet and calls him to the encounter, let this thing go over until my successor is in his seat, and until the new Attorney-General will be up in the Department of Justice. That is the way to do this thing.

Do not ask to lay this amendment on the table as a final and decisive vote to determine the question on its merits. Oh, no; wait until the men who inaugurated it, who executed it, and who are able to defend it, are within the lists.

Now, I move to lay the amendment on the table, for I want to have it taken up then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I gave notice that at the proper time I should offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator that there are two amendments of the Committee on Appropriations yet reserved. The Secretary will report the next amendment reserved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the credentials of John I. Mitchell, chosen by the Legislature of Pennsylvania a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1881; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

REFUNDING OF THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. HOAR. I present for reference to the Committee on Appropriations an amendment to the deficiency appropriation bill, and I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. —. That all existing provisions of law authorizing the refunding of the national debt shall apply to any bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 4½ per cent. per annum which may hereafter become redeemable: Provided, That in lieu of the bonds authorized to be issued by the act of July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and the acts amendatory thereto, and the certificates authorized by the act of February 26, 1879, entitled "An act to authorize the issue of certificates of deposit in aid of the refunding of the public debt," the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue bonds to an amount not exceeding $400,000,000, of denominations of $50, or some multiple of that sum, which shall bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, after five years, and payable twenty years from the date of issue; and also Treasury notes to an amount not exceeding $300,000,000, in denominations of $10, or some multiple of that sum not exceeding $1,000, either registered or coupon, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, after one year, and payable in ten years from the date of issue; and no Treasury note of a less denomination than $100 shall be registered. The bonds and Treasury notes shall be, in all other respects, of like character and subject to the same provisions as the bonds authorized to be issued by the act of July 14,1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and acts amendatory thereto: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize an increase of the public debt.

Mr. WHYTE. That ought to go to the Committee on Finance, and not to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the reference of the amendment to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOAR. I should be glad to have the amendment go to the Committee on Finance, if the Senate will consent that the rule requiring it then to go to the Committee on Appropriations one day before it is offered in the Senate will not be insisted on. The amendment simply provides for refunding at 3 per cent., leaving out all the other details, leaving out the fifth section; and I desire to have it in the power of the Senate to pass such an amendment if they see fit. If the Senator from Maryland and the Senate will consent, I will ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be referred to the Committee on Finance, and that they may, if they see fit, move it as an amendment to the deficiency bill, notwithstanding the rule requiring the Committee on Appropriations to consider it twenty-four hours.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? If not, the amendment will be referred to the Committee on Finance with that understanding.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it understood that there is no objection to that course?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is. The objection under Rule 27 will be waived.

Mr. ALLISON. Under any rule. That is, this amendment, if agreed to by the Committee on Finance, may be offered to the deficiency bill?

Mr. HOAR. Notwithstanding the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Notwithstanding the rule.

Mr. WALLACE. Do I understand that the amendment goes to the Committee on Appropriations without objection on the part of the Committee on Finance?

Mr. WHYTE. No, it is to go to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR. This is an amendment to the deficiency bill, which I suppose will be here to-morrow.

Mr. WALLACE. It is here now.

Mr. ALLISON. It has been referred.

Mr. HOAR. In order that it should come within the rule, only that part of the rule which has been mentioned without going into any other part of the rule, it ought to be moved by a standing or a select committee and then go to the Committee on Appropriations twenty-four hours before it is offered; but it being suggested on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations that it should go to the Committee on Finance, unanimous consent was asked and obtained that it might go to the Committee on Finance, and that so much of the rule as prevented its being offered by them, if they chose to offer it to the Senate, should be waived.

Mr. WALLACE. The reason of my question was, that the subcommittee on the deficiency bill are about to meet, and if there is any action to be taken by the Committee on Appropriations it should be attended to at once.

Mr. HOAR. The Committee on Finance will be able to deal with it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Massachusetts said that by consent of the Committee on Appropriations this arrangement was made. I know nothing of it, and I ought to have known if it was done.

Mr. HOAR. My friend is mistaken. The Chair asked unanimous consent of the Senate, and that unanimous consent was given.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Unanimous consent to what?

Mr. HOAR. That this amendment, the character of which I have explained, might be referred to the Committee on Finance, and that it should be in order for them to move it as an amendment hereafter, if they see fit.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senate cannot do that.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator does not care to have the amendment go to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not know that I do; but then I do not want an arrangement made for the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia object?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I reserve all points of order. I shall not consent to an arrangement by which the amendment shall be beyond the control of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOAR. I must then stand upon my right, it being a plain desire of the whole Senate, as it seemed to me. The Chair asked if unanimous consent was given to the request, and declared that it had been given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the state of the case.

Mr. HOAR. It is too late now to object.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. We will see when it comes up.

Mr. BAYARD. What disposition has been made of the proposed amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely say now that I have had no intimation whatever of the intention to offer such an amendment, nor so far as I know has any other member of the Finance Committee had any such intimation, nor can I say what the action of that committee will be on it.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to the pending bill, which was reserved.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 831, the committee report to insert:

For the purchase of the private papers of the late confederate Generals Braxton Bragg and Leonidas Polk relating to the late war of the rebellion, $20,000.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the amendment which I offered is agreed to by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the amendment the following proviso:

Provided, That the President of the United States shall be satisfied that all such papers now in existence are delivered over to the United States, and that the same are of historic importance and value equal to the sum paid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment to the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the amendment is adopted I desire to make an inquiry.

Mr. HOAR. My amendment, I understand, has been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations what is the character of these papers that are to be purchased by the Government?

Mr. BECK. There is a report, Executive Document No. 6, third session Forty-sixth Congress, "A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with law, certain information relative to the negotiations with the legal representatives of the late confederate Generals Bragg and Polk for the purchase of certain papers relating to the late war," in which there is a list of the papers, covering, perhaps, from pages 12 to 53, an account of what each paper is. At the last session of Congress in the sundry civil bill we made this provision:

The Secretary of War is authorized to negotiate with the legal representatives of the late confederate Generals Bragg and Polk for the purchase of their private papers relating to the late war, and said Secretary shall report thereon at the next session of Congress.

I understand this report is made in compliance with that provision. The papers belonging to General Polk, I understand, are now being printed, while the papers belonging to General Bragg are not yet published, but the information in regard to them is now in the hands of the Government. It seemed to us, after hearing all the facts, that the arrangement should be entered into.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to interpose objections to things that are of no great importance, but I cannot understand, for the life of me, what private papers these generals could have that could be of any benefit to the Government of the United States. This speaks of letters.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to say that after the question is fairly put by the Senator from Illinois I will ask the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] who has had the matter under consideration, to be kind enough to give us the information laid before his committee, for the amendment came from the Military Committee.

Mr. LOGAN. This report is signed by "Marcus J. Wright, agent of the War Department for the collection of confederate records;" and here is a statement of the papers that I suppose have been found in the hands of the heirs of these generals, consisting of private letters written to those generals by other persons connected with the confederate service. The letters may be of service. I do not say they will not be, but I should like to know from some one something of the character of service they would be to the Government of the United States. I cannot understand for the life of me.

I remember very well, so far as General Polk is concerned, who was doubtless a very brave man on the confederate side, that he was killed at Kenesaw Mountain some time prior to the termination of the war; I remember very well the day when we received the news of his death. He could have had no private papers after that time, and no papers, records, or anything of the kind that could be of any interest to the country with regard to the war up to that time. He had nothing but private letters written to him, and a history and a boundary of his jurisdiction as a commanding general of the confederate army. I will say to the Senator in charge of the bill that it is not necessary to refer to his private papers to find out his jurisdiction as a commanding officer. That can be found in the records that are here. The orders from the war department of the confederate army, the orders of his commanding general, General Lee, the orders of the so-called president of the southern confederacy would determine that question. It certainly is not necessary to have these papers for that; and what light the private letters of this man could throw upon the affairs of this country that would be of advantage, I cannot understand.

I do not wish to criticise the action of the War Department or anybody connected with it, or the committee or anybody connected with it; but my judgment, no matter whom it hits, is that this is merely a mode of granting pensions to the heirs and widows of confederate generals. That is all it means. There is nothing in these papers that amounts to anything. There is nothing in all of them that makes them worth $20,000. All the records that amount to anything in reference to the confederacy are now in the War Department, for which the Government paid $75,000. They have the records of all the confederate army, of all the corps, of every brigade, and of each regiment; they have the general orders and everything of that kind. What else is there that they desire I should like to know?

I do not believe in this policy at all; I do not believe it is good policy in any sense whatever. I have never heard of any appropriation of money to pay for the private papers of any Union general in the Army; not a dollar. Why is it that the private papers of some man who was on the Union side are not considered of value? I have never heard of any one asking to sell his papers. I have never heard of anybody even suggesting that an appropriation should be made to purchase the private letters of General A B or General C D of the Union Army. I know men who were in the Union Army, who had larger commands than either of these generals, and perhaps received as many letters, and perhaps wrote as many letters, yet no man has ever said that they were of value sufficient for the Congress of the United States to appropriate money to purchase them.

Before the Congress of the United States should appropriate money to buy private letters which belonged to some confederate officer or Union officer, it should be demonstrated that they are of value to the history of this country, and we should know in what respect they are to be of value. They should be examined; we should examine them here as a committee, or appoint some one to do it. The fact that there is somebody connected with the War Department who thinks it would be a very nice thing to pay $20,000 to the heirs of confederate officers, (and this is only a mode by which it may be accomplished,) is not evidence sufficient to my mind that the people of this country should be taxed for any such purpose, unless we have the evidence of the value of these papers.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to ask him if it is claimed that any officer of the War Department says that these papers are valuable?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not say that any one does.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I think not.

Mr. LOGAN. I say this report is signed by "Marcus J. Wright, agent of the War Department for the collection of confederate records." I do not know anything about Marcus J. Wright. I do not know anything about anybody connected with these confederate records; but I will say that from the number of letters stated in the book somebody must have been out picking them up and getting them together to see if Congress could not be induced to appropriate a large amount of money for the purchase of the same. Who has been doing it, I do not know; but that it has been done, there is the evidence.

No man has ever asked you to appropriate money for the records made and letters written by and to the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE.] Why? He had as large a command as either of these men. Why should not his communications be of value to this country? There is nothing in our history that is sought by the War Department except the orders of the general officers which are found in the reports in the War Department. No private letters are ever asked for from any general that I know of on the Union side; and all these things on the confederate side we have now without the private letters. I do not wish to pay for them as far as I am concerned. I merely state that I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me there is very great force in what the honorable Senator from Illinois has said, both in the reasons which he has given for what he has said and also in his authority in regard to what is valuable in illustrating the history of the war in which he himself bore so illustrious a part; but it appears to me that without quite agreeing with the opinion which he thinks this country has formed of these papers, we have gone past the stage to which the honorable Senator's arguments are applicable.

We passed a law two years ago—I was not aware of it until it was read—directing, on the recommendation of somebody in the War Office, some agent of the Government, that negotiations be opened with these women for the private papers of their husbands. Having applied to them or negotiated with them, and obtained their terms, it seems to me we agreed to buy the papers if they are willing to sell them at what we shall find and think they are worth. The law required a report to Congress. Though I do not agree with the Senator from Kentucky, that we have made a binding bargain, we have gone to that extent; we have applied to two ladies in private life for their husband's papers in their possession, and obtained the terms on which they are willing to sell them. Now, with the amendment the law, if it pass, will read in this way, that the President of the United States is authorized, on his examination of these papers, to purchase them at a sum not exceeding $20,000, at such sum as he shall find they are worth as historical matter to our Government.

Whatever may be a proper policy on the whole, I think that is reasonably safe. The incoming President of the United States himself bore a very distinguished share in this war, on the Union side, and he is a person of very large literary attainment; he has been a student from his boyhood, and probably there are few persons in the country, saying nothing about his official position, to whom we should all, on both sides of this Chamber, sooner be willing to refer a question of the value of historical material.

Of course, very valuable historical material may come from the archives or the private correspondence of the enemy. We have obtained from English sources valuable material illustrative of our revolutionary history and our revolutionary war. It seems to me, therefore, although what the Senator from Illinois says has so great weight, that having made this request and gone so far in the negotiation, it is safe for us and is proper and becoming that we should authorize the President of the United States to examine these papers, and, if he finds it to the interest of the Government, to purchase them at what he thinks their historical value.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am satisfied that the adoption of this amendment would be the establishment of a very bad precedent. There is no reason on the face of the earth why the Government of the United States should not purchase the private papers of every general officer on both sides of the line, if it purchases these papers.

The Senator from Illinois refers to my papers; I should not have referred to them myself but for his reference. I boxed up all my papers, private letters and all, as soon as I knew that the war records were going to be published and sent them to the War Department as a matter of duty, and asked the proper officer to use such of them as he chose to use and take copies of them and send me the remainder. I think that is the duty of every officer of the Army and of the relatives and heirs of every deceased officer of the Army.

It is no time now to begin to appropriate money to buy these records. If you start out on that system, there is no end to it, because there are hundreds of meritorious Union officers, and confederate officers also, who have records that will be brought here for sale.

I shall vote against this amendment simply because I do not think it would be wise to pass it, not that I would not be very glad to see the families of these officers receive the $20,000 which is named in the amendment. I should be very glad indeed to know that any stroke of good fortune had thrown in their hands that amount of money, just as much so as I would be glad to find that it had fallen into the hands of the widows and children of Union officers. I say that with perfect candor; but I do think the precedent would be a bad one, and I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, in 1872 the Government of the United States purchased from Mr. Pickett the confederate archives for the War Department at the sum of $75,000. Subsequently, they purchased the war record of General E. Kirby Smith, an officer of the confederate army, paying $2,500. Subsequently they purchased the papers of General Albert Sidney Johnston. In the purchase of those papers the Secretary of War appointed a commission. That commission was composed of General Garfield, as I understand, General Cockerill, and General Williams of Michigan. After an examination of those papers they regarded them as of the value of $10,000, and they were purchased by the Government at that price. Subsequent to that the papers which I apprehend were those of General Sterling Price were purchased of Colonel Snead and for which the Government paid $10,000. Subsequent negotiations were authorized, as I understood, to be opened for the purchase of the papers of General Bragg and of General Polk, and those papers were sent here for the purpose of being scheduled and their value looked into. It appears, so far as I can learn, that those generals kept duplicate copies of all the headquarters papers which were returned by them to Richmond. It was estimated that those papers were of the value of $10,000 each.

Whether I would have favored originally the policy of opening out this history of war records which, it is said, have cost $80,000, is not now the question. If the purpose and design of this Government is to make a fair, honest history or to leave the material on which to prepare an honest history of both sides accessible to the historian, then we should have the documents of those who controlled the armies on both sides.

That the papers of General Polk are of the utmost importance to the true history of the confederacy we all know; that those of General Bragg are of great importance is equally true. The question therefore is not now what it would have been were this an original proposition for a purchase; but as the Government has inaugurated the policy of gathering up these records for the purpose of making history, is it now wise to complete what the Government has begun by the purchase of these papers?

But the Senator from Illinois says these papers may not be of value, that the Government now has by the Pickett purchase, as I understood him, the seventy-five thousand dollar purchase, all that it is necessary, all that can be obtained of value in the development of the confederate side of the question. If that be true, the amendment adopted by the Senate at the instance of the Senator from Massachusetts leaves the proposition perfectly safe, because it is well known that the President who is to act as judge of the value of these papers is as thoroughly competent for that task as a historian, as a scholar, as any man in the length and breadth of this land; nor is it reasonable to suppose that the President who is to pass upon the value of these papers would declare them to be of any value whatever unless they were, or that he would fix the price of $10,000 on the papers of each of these parties unless they were of that value.

But it has been said that these papers should be donated, given up, Mr. President, after they have been in the actual possession for fifteen years of those who have possession of them. I apprehend the question of title is not one that could be now opened, and it is for them to determine whether or not they will give up these papers to the Government. If it is not intended to make a complete history, then abolish the bureau of war records. If it is not so intended, then all this large sum of $25,000 in one case, $2,500 in another, $10,000 in another, and $10,000 in another—all that is money worse than wasted, and the $80,000 we pay annually to keep up this bureau is worse than wasted. If we go into this history at all, let us complete it. If the papers are not of value the President will say so; if they are we should have them.

Mr. BURNSIDE. This bureau has in its possession already all the records of the confederate war department.

Mr. MAXEY. How do you know that?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Because they were captured.

Mr. MAXEY. How do you know that they were all captured?

Mr. BURNSIDE. There might have been some papers kept in their pockets.

Mr. MAXEY. I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island that the Secretary of War has not so considered, because he has bought papers which he did regard as valuable or he would not have made the purchase.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am speaking of the papers which were at the headquarters of the confederate government. The War Department here also has its own papers.

Mr. MAXEY. I simply desire to say to those who hold, like myself, that the history should be complete, if it is to be made under the imprimatur of this Government, let us have a fair show, give us our side of the question, and let the papers come forward and be examined.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will now go on and state what I was about to state before. We have the papers that were captured at Richmond; we have our Union papers which were here in Washington. Those two sets of papers form the foundation for the publication. There is no disposition on the part of anybody to suppress any of them. They will all be published in the regular order, so that we shall get a pretty fair understanding of the situation from the publication of those papers.

Now, all the private papers of these generals should be given up as a matter of policy. If those who served in the confederacy desire a fair history to be presented to the public, they should give up their papers, and so should the Union generals. You cannot compel a Union general to give up his papers, but General Meade's papers were all given up, and I know other papers were given up. As I said before, I gave up mine. I think it the duty of the general officers, and of their families, their representatives, to give up these papers. If they do not give them up and any injustice occurs to their side of the question from the fact that they are not given up, the blame rests with them.

It is not for the Government of the United States to say to them, "We will pay you what you ask for these papers in order that your side may be represented." We are not going to pay you to have your side represented. I hope this is not going to be a sectional thing. I do not want to make it so. The fact that we have already paid $75,000 for a certain set of papers and $10,000 for another, and $12,500 for another, does not make this right. Two wrongs do not make a right. I thought it wrong to pay for papers in the first instance. I never would have paid a dollar for them. I never asked to be paid for mine, and I never would pay a Union general or a Union general's family one dollar for them. If I wanted to contribute to a Union general's family, I would say I will give you so much for the relief of that family, but I would not say, "I will give $10,000 for papers which are necessary to your vindication, and in which you and your parent were interested." It is your duty to give them up, to see that your parent is properly represented in history, and your posterity is interested in having it so, and you should give up these papers; they belong to history; they do not belong to you, and the Government of the United States should not pay for them. I would not vote a penny to pay Mrs. General Meade for her papers. I should be very glad to vote to give Mrs. General Meade a pension, and I should be very glad to do anything I could for these families in any way in my power, but I never would vote for buying private papers of officers, because the very moment you start out on that system you are on the wide sea; there is no end to it; and justice would require you to continue to buy papers for a long time to come.

Mr. BECK. I hope we shall have a vote on this question at as early a moment as possible; but I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island, whose sense of justice I know is equal to that of any Senator, to the fact that by law we provided that—

> The Secretary of War is authorized to negotiate with the legal representatives of the late confederate Generals Bragg and Polk for the purchase of their private papers relating to the late war, and said Secretary shall report thereon at the next session of Congress.

And under that, as proven before us yesterday in committee, the papers were delivered over to the War Department, and a large proportion of the papers belonging to the estate of General Polk have now gone into the history of the great war of the rebellion; all those belonging to Mrs. Bragg and her children have been catalogued and are ready for use.

Mr. CONKLING. May I interrupt the Senator a moment? What does he mean by their having gone into history? What has actually been done with them?

Mr. BECK. General Polk's papers are in the hands of the officers of the United States; but whether the volume to which they belong has been absolutely printed or not I am not sure; but they are in course of publication.

Mr. LOGAN. The report shows the fact that these papers have not gone into history and have not been printed at all. We desired all her papers, and they have merely been registered to be examined.

Mr. BECK. Polk's papers are now in the hands of the officers, and they are using them as though they were absolutely their own. That is the fact.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Is there any statement from the Secretary of War that he has negotiated for these papers and has agreed to give a certain price?

Mr. BECK. The Secretary of War purchased—

First, a collection of trans-Mississippi papers for	$2,500
Second, the "Sidney Johnston" papers	10,000
Third, the "Snead papers"	10,000

The law authorized this negotiation, and under that the families of these two dead generals surrendered their papers. Mr. Scott, who thought perhaps they ought not to be purchased, closes his report on the 6th day of December, 1880, by saying:

> If it be decided to purchase at all, I recommend that $10,000 be offered for each of the collections in question.

This amendment is, in my judgment, to maintain the good faith of the Government. Whether it was good policy or not to purchase any of these papers is another question. Twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars has been paid to three different parties. The Secretary of War was authorized to negotiate for these. He has done it; he has them in his possession. The report shows that he was expected to pay $10,000 each to these people. He obtained them under these pretenses, under these assumptions, using them because they were so delivered under that belief, and whether they were worth one dollar or not, after all that has been done, I would pay at least a sum not exceeding $10,000 each, in the discretion of the President, after investigation, to keep the good faith of the Government to the families of men who are dead. I would not take advantage of the families of General Bragg and General Polk by getting papers from them if they were not worth one dollar, if they thought they were worth something, and we induced them to give them up on the belief that we were going to pay. The honor of this Government is something, and the honor of this people is worth more than the amount of money this will cost. When we passed that law authorizing the negotiation, when we induced them to believe they were going to be paid for these papers, it seems to me we ought to do it, right or wrong, valuable or not, because we have taken the papers from them, and there is no means of showing that we have not used such as we want.

I do not care to say any more.

Mr. THURMAN. Permit me to ask my friend from Kentucky before he takes his seat whether the officers of the Government who have examined these papers recommend their purchase?

Mr. BECK. They have recommended it at various times; but of late they have made rather doubtful reports. They were examined by a board of generals of the Army, of which the President-elect was one.

Mr. LOGAN. When I objected to this proposition I did so upon the theory as I stated, and as was well stated by the Senator from Rhode Island, that it forms a bad precedent. I will try to demonstrate that from the report that the committee have used for the purpose of coming to their conclusion in reference to this appropriation. I read from the report:

> The Polk papers have been placed in the hands of the Government with permission to use such as are deemed important to the publication now authorized by law. The price asked for the entire collection is $10,000.
> The Bragg papers have been submitted for the purpose of being catalogued. No present price is stipulated for, but they, as well as the Polk collection, were appraised in 1878 at $10,000, and were once offered at, and can doubtless now be purchased for, that sum.
> The policy of this Department has been, as far as practicable, to procure such important military documents (Union and confederate) as were missing from its archives by gift or loan.
> No purchases have been made from Union officers or their legal representatives, and the only purchases it has made from confederate sources have been:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | First, a collection of trans-Mississippi papers, for | $2,500 |
> | Second, the Sidney Johnston papers | 10,000 |
> | Third, the Snead papers | 10,000 |
> Since the establishment, July 1, 1878, of an agency for obtaining confederate military documents by gift or loan, many important collections have thus been placed at the disposal of the Government. A list of the more extensive of these collections is transmitted.

Now, what follows?

As far as known to the Department, the only important collections of confederate records held for sale are those now under consideration and the Hood papers; but it may be well for Congress—

This is the report of the Secretary of War, and I desire Senators to listen to it, although doubtless they have read it—

But it may be well for Congress to consider whether the purchase of these collections may not cause dissatisfaction among some who have heretofore placed valuable documents gratuitously at the disposal of the Government. Moreover, important documents have been received from Union officers and their representatives, and there seems to be no good reason for paying for the one class of records and not for the other.

Respectfully submitted,

ALEX. RAMSEY,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT
Of the United States Senate.

In the very document upon which you base your appropriation of $20,000 the Secretary of War tells you it is bad policy and that there is no reason why you should pay for confederate records and not pay for Union records, and not only that, but there is no reason why you should pay for these records and refuse to pay for those which have been loaned or presented as a gift.

I desire also in this connection to call attention to an extract from the annual report of the Secretary of War in 1879. He says:

UNION AND CONFEDERATE WAR RECORDS.

The preparation of these records for publication is progressing satisfactorily under the efficient management of Colonel R. N. Scott, of the Army.

The War Department agent for collecting such confederate records as may be placed, by gift or loan, at the disposal of the Government, has been very successful.

The Southern Historical Society has placed its collection at the service of the Department, and valuable documents have been furnished by Generals Johnston, Pemberton, Wheeler, Jones, Ruggles, and others. In fact, there is a general disposition on the part of ex-confederate officers to contribute material to the official History of the War.

In a few instances records of the confederate armies are held for sale, but Colonel Scott renews his objection to the purchase of such documents; and in his views I concur.

It was well said by the Senator from Massachusetts that we are partially, not entirely, obligated in this matter by a previous act passed. I presume when that act was incorporated in our laws it was done by some friend of these parties at the time to lay the foundation for these very appropriations. At the time the first provision appropriating money for purchasing confederate records was passed by the Congress of the United States it was passed in an appropriation bill, without any one in the Senate Chamber except the committee having knowledge as to what it meant. It was for the purchase of certain records; nobody noticed it and it went through, and in that way the purchase of these records commenced. Up to the time you commenced appropriating money for them every confederate and Union officer gave what documents he had to the War Department that they might be used in future history.

But my friend from Texas says "we want a fair show in the history." Nobody denies any one in this country a fair chance in the history of this matter. No one wishes to deny any man a fair chance for his history to be blazoned before the world. It is not that; but if men want their history correctly written, let them furnish that which will make an honest history without, like leeches, sucking the blood of this Government for the purpose of giving them a fair history. All the history which I have ever made—and it is little—I charge no man and no government a cent for; it is not of much value; but if it was of greatly more value than it is, my country would never have to pay one cent for it.

Pass this bill with this amendment, and I ask any Senator to tell me what private soldier who has picked up papers on the battle-field may not hold them and demand money for them? Why is it that correspondence between private soldiers and their families is not of value as well as the correspondence between the generals and their families? If you want to get a history of this war, to get an honest one on both sides, let officers and men give to this Government that which they possess by way of letters and communications which they received during the war which throw any light upon the conduct of armies or individuals or of our Government. Let it be done in that way. The best histories that we have to-day of parts of this war are the histories which are written by regiments calling upon their comrades, each and every officer and private, to furnish a short document that is to go to make up a history of the company or regiment, and they do it. The best histories of the part that they played that I have read have been made up in that way, and they have been written from the documents of the private soldier and the officer, not with a view of paying some glowing tribute to some man, whether deserved or not, but stating the facts as they did exist at the time. That is the way to get an honest and true history of the conduct of the forces on either side during the terrible and unfortunate conflict between the people of this country.

Pass this amendment, and, as I said, every confederate officer who is unfortunate who has papers will want money for them, and perhaps every Union officer, too. There is exactly where you are leading to. You are leading us in a line which may induce men on both sides to say, "Here, I have valuable papers; pay me for them or you cannot get them."

General Lee's papers were of great value, doubtless. How much are we to pay for them? The papers of many Senators here who were on the confederate side may be of great value. Are we to pay for them if they should be so unfortunate as to die within a few years? Are we to pay when General Grant passes away a large sum of money to his heirs for his private papers? So with General Sherman; so with General Sheridan; so with all these men. Is that what we mean? Do we mean a general pensioning of the families of the officers on both sides? It cannot be obtained in any other way except by paying for papers which are of any value whatever perhaps to the history of this country.

That is what this measure means. It does not mean $20,000 to the heirs of General Bragg and General Polk, but it means hundreds of thousands of dollars in the future to the heirs of other men on both sides, and to many men living, on both sides, who have papers.

In answer to the Senator from Texas, who desires honest history, as I do, I say let the men who desire an honest history who have papers which throw light upon any fact during this great conflict bring them to the War Department, and if they desire to keep them, let the War Department take copies of them and return the originals to the owners. That will show at least some patriotism. It will not show that all there is of patriotic devotion in the American people is merely to squeeze a little money out of the Government for that which is of no value on earth to them. If they keep them their light may not shine. They are worth nothing, and can be worth nothing to any one except to history.

I oppose this whole proposition. I have always voted against propositions of this kind, and I shall have to do so; for it means naught but opening the gates or doors of the Treasury to benefit certain persons who cannot be placed upon the pension-roll of the United States of America.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, this amendment of the committee as amended I suppose will be laid on the table. I propose to make that motion.

Several SENATORS. Let it go.

Mr. VEST. I want to say one word to the Senator from Illinois before I make that motion; because I cannot content myself with simply voting to lay this whole question on the table, as I shall do, without saying as a southern man, and, as I believe, speaking the sentiment of the southern people, that I repudiate the idea that we propose to pension the widows of our generals or their children in any such fashion as that.

Sir, recollecting the devotion to the cause of the South of those now dead, I have from the beginning deprecated this thing of peddling out memoirs of our dead generals or of our living soldiers to this or any other government——

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator, I know, will allow me to make a suggestion. What I said about pensioning applied to both sides, not to one alone. As I said it would apply to those who could not go on the pension-roll on either side; this was the mode by which to provide for them. I made no application to one more than to another.

Mr. VEST. For myself, and as I believe for a majority of the southern people, I say the fact is that we make no such claim on the Government of the United States. I do not call it a pretext when men tell us they desire a fair and impartial history of themselves made. Sir, the history of that unfortunate war belongs to the victors and not to the vanquished; and when the confederacy surrendered it surrendered the history of the war as it did its munitions and its muskets. They belong to the United States Government, the history is their property; and if records should be piled here mountain high, by sale or gift, the history would still be the same. There is only left to us the demand of justice in a fair representation of the glories of so many hard-fought fields. The history of the war belongs to the Government, and for myself and the people with whose destinies I was united I have simply to say God speed that history, may it be glorious, finally and forever.

I move, sir, to lay this amendment, and I hope this question forever, upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 31, noes 10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next reserved amendment, on page 66, beginning with line 1619.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is, after line 1618, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay for preparing the index to private claims, under the resolution of June 16, 1880, directing him to prepare an alphabetical list of all private claims which have been before the Senate, with the action of the Senate thereon, since the 3d day of March, 1867, $2,500.

Mr. VEST. I move to amend the amendment by striking out those words and inserting:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay for preparing the index to private claims under the resolution of June 16, 1880, directing him to prepare an alphabetical list of all private claims which have been before the Senate, with the action of the Senate thereon, since the 3d day of March, 1867, the sum of $4,250.

I ask the attention of the Senator from Kentucky having the bill in charge. By the act of July 28, 1866, $5,000 were appropriated and $2,000 by another act, making $7,000 in all, for indexing the private claims at the Thirty-third, Thirty-fourth, Thirty-fifth, Thirty-sixth, Thirty-seventh, Thirty-eighth, and Thirty-ninth Congresses. The work done under the present authority embraces the private claims of the Fortieth, Forty-first, Forty-second, Forty-third, Forty-fourth, and the first and second sessions of the Forty-sixth Congresses, at least one-third more labor performed under this provision than the work for which Congress paid $7,000. I know a gentleman from my State employed in this labor, and several other clerks were assisting, more or less. I know this gentleman who worked here five months will receive from the amendment of the committee, if adopted, some $50 or $75 per month, out of which he has to pay his ordinary expenses. The Secretary of the Senate assumed that Congress would pay these men at the rate of $125 per month, which is little enough in the city of Washington. Men entitled to a furlough of two months during the summer remained here to work on this list. The work has been well done, faithfully done, and $50 per month would be a very little allowance. It is great injustice to the employés who were engaged on it. That is all I desire to say in regard to it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The facts are about these: the Senate did pass a resolution a few years ago directing the Secretary to make up the list of private claims to date. The Secretary performed the duty. He employed clerks under pay the year round. Most probably every other man who worked upon this business has been paid by the Senate regularly along. The committee believed there were some persons entitled to a part of this sum perhaps who did not receive pay during the time this work was performed, and the committee thought $2,500 was sufficient to pay for all that kind of work. I am not opposing this especially; but the Committee on Appropriations believed, after considering the whole question, that $2,500 ought to settle it.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question. He spoke of the Secretary having been directed by the Senate to have this work done, and spoke of the Secretary as a salaried officer. Does he mean that the Secretary claims for himself any part of this amount?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, no.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought the Senator's language would imply that the Secretary was to have part of it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am sorry that I used language which conveyed such an implication. I did not intend to imply any such thing. I know the Secretary gets no portion of this money. I have never had a thought in that direction, but many of the employés who are paid the year round by the Senate, were engaged in this work, and I do not know but that all of them were of that class.

Mr. HARRIS. Upon a former occasion, under exactly the same character of resolution requiring the Secretary of the Senate to perform exactly the same character of work, Congress appropriated $7,000 to pay the expense. This work amounts to one-third more than the work then performed. The present Secretary of the Senate employing clerks to perform the duties which the resolution required at his hands, in the exercise of what he supposed to be a proper discretion, stated to these employés that he supposed they would receive compensation at the rate of $125 per month for their services. They have performed their work fully, thoroughly, and well, and taking an account of the time actually devoted to this service, the estimate of the Secretary of the Senate is $4,200, nearly three thousand dollars less than was allowed for a similar work, and certainly not in excess of a just compensation to these employés. For that reason I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri and against the proposition of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to add my testimony to that of the Senators from Tennessee and the Senator from Missouri. This work was authorized by law to be done. The Secretary was directed to do it, and he might have gone much further and hired other clerks to do the work, which, if he had so done, would have cost the Government more than $10,000; but these men were kept here. Everybody says the work done on this index is extra work. It is not the ordinary work of the clerks; it is all extra work. They staid here all last summer, when they might have been at home with their friends and families, and worked assiduously on this index, and I think it is nothing but just and right that they should be paid.

Mr. BECK. I hope we shall have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The vote will be taken as soon as debate ceases on the amendment.

Mr. BECK. I will only say that I agree with every word that the Senator from Missouri has said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

Mr. WITHERS. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me to present a conference report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive the report.

THE DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WITHERS. I submit a report from the committee of conference on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 49, and 50.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 60; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 63: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 63, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In line 23 of said amendment, after the word "including," insert the words "one-half of;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 66: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 66, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Add at the close of the amendment, as a new section, the following:

"SEC. 6. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to sell to the highest bidder, at public auction, and under the provisions of section 3 of this act, the following, namely: All the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to a certain parcel of land in the square south of square 181, in said city of Washington, described as follows, to wit: Beginning at a point on the north side of N street northwest, 48 feet 2 inches west of the west line of Sixteenth street; running thence along N street westerly eighteen feet; thence northerly 62.14 feet to Massachusetts avenue; thence southeasterly along said avenue 19.69 feet; thence 54.27 feet south to the point of beginning on N street. The proceeds of sale to be applied to the use mentioned in section 3."

R. E. WITHERS,
ISHAM G. HARRIS,
WM. WINDOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
T. R. COBB,
JO. C. S. BLACKBURN,
FRANK HISCOCK,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. McMILLAN. May I ask the Senator who has submitted the report what is the property referred to there to be sold?

Mr. WITHERS. A little strip of property that formerly belonged to a foreigner that has been escheated to the Government, and the commissioners of the District and the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, as I understand, recommend its sale. It is a very small matter.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator speak of the property mentioned in the last amendment?

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, sir.

The report was concurred in.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Mr. VEST. On page 59, line 1433, I propose the following amendment:

For the purpose of reimbursing the United States Treasury for a certain sum of money appropriated by this Congress for depredations committed by the Kiowa and Comanche and Sioux tribes of Indians, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to withhold from the annuities payable to said Indians an amount equal to said sum so appropriated, and he may withhold all of said sum out of the annuities due or to become due to said Indians in any one year, or otherwise, as between him and the Secretary of the Interior may be agreed upon, due reference being had to the care and welfare of said Indians.

Mr. BECK. I raise the point of order that that is legislation on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has not stated the amendment yet.

Mr. VEST. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, addressed to my colleague, now in the chair, [Mr. COCKRELL,] conveying information about this amendment. The amendment comes from the Department of the Interior, at the request of the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 2, 1881.

SIR: I inclose herewith an item of appropriation for insertion in the sundry civil or deficiency appropriation bill now pending before Congress to reimburse the United States for such sum as may be appropriated for the Kiowa and Comanche and Sioux tribes of Indians for the sum taken from their annuities under the provisions of Senate bill No. 1181.

Very respectfully,

C. SCHURZ,
Secretary.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL,
United States Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope no point of order will be made, for this reason: at this Congress a bill has been passed and become a law making certain appropriations to pay certain claims to come out of these annuities. There is no provision for replacing that amount. By leaving it to the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury it may be paid in one, two, or five or ten years. It will be paid in such manner that no harm will be done the Indians. It makes no additional appropriations. It is simply to prevent the whole amount going out of the Treasury this year that this amendment is offered. There is no question but that it is right. I saw the Secretary of the Interior in person, and this is his suggestion.

Mr. BECK. I have made the point of order that it is legislation on this bill, and I make it for this reason: that if this be allowed——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The Senator may proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. BECK. We have only one day to have these amendments considered in the House and considered in conference. However right this is, it is impossible for some of us on the conference committee to understand it, and if this amendment is right it ought to pass as an independent measure.

Mr. COCKRELL. A conference committee must be had.

Mr. BECK. A conference committee must be had, but a conference committee which has never looked into the question, not being members of the Indian Committee, cannot be expected to pay much regard to such an amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the amendment come from the Indian Committee or any other committee?

Mr. BECK. Not that I know of.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, but from the head of a Department.

Mr. BECK. It has never been before the Committee on Appropriations or anywhere else that I know of.

Mr. COCKRELL. It has been before the Committee on Appropriations in the letter from the Secretary.

Mr. BECK. When?

Mr. COCKRELL. I so understood, and was so informed, that he had sent a letter to the Committee on Appropriations of the House and a letter to the Appropriations Committee of the Senate making this suggestion.

Mr. BECK. I never saw it, so far as I am aware.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Kentucky, but the facts are as stated by the Senator from Missouri, that we have taken by a bill, which has passed both Houses, from these tribes, the Kiowas and Comanches, all the money that they are entitled to for this year. The object of this amendment is to allow the appropriations made for these tribes to go on and permit the money to be taken out in the course of two or three or four years. It is true it has not been regularly referred to any committee, but the proposition is perfectly right and just in itself, and it ought to pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky insist on the point of order?

Mr. BECK. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair submits it to the Senate. As many as are of the opinion that the point of order is well taken, will say "aye;" contrary, "no." [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

A division was called for; and being taken, resulted—ayes 20, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays to get a quorum.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Tennessee will pardon me I think if the Chair will take the question once more a quorum will vote.

Mr. HARRIS. I will withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays very cheerfully if we can have a quorum voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair state the point of order once more?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky raises the point of order that the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri is not in order.

Mr. CONKLING. Being general legislation on an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will now be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 1432 it is proposed to insert:

For the purpose of reimbursing the United States Treasury for a certain sum of money appropriated by this Congress for depredations committed by the Kiowa and Comanche and Sioux tribes of Indians, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to withhold from the annuities payable to said Indians an amount equal to said sum so appropriated; and he may withhold all of said sum out of the annuities due or to become due to said Indians, in any one year, or otherwise, as between him and the Secretary of the Interior may be agreed upon, due reference being had to the care and welfare of said Indians.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now let the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, recommending this amendment and sent here for that purpose, be read.

Mr. HOAR. Does this come from any committee?

Mr. COCKRELL. From the head of a Department.

Mr. HOAR. There is no estimate for it.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is not a dollar appropriated. It is not on that ground. There is no appropriation. It is simply to give a discretion to the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to appropriations which have already been made.

Mr. HOAR. It is simply legislation, in other words, on an appropriation bill, and clearly out of order.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is not "simply legislation." There is no legislation in it.

Mr. HOAR. It is clearly out of order under our rules, and is sought to be made in order on the ground that there is a letter from a Secretary recommending it. The only case in which a letter from a Secretary can have any possible practical application is where there is an appropriation of money proposed to carry out an existing law in pursuance of an estimate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the letter of the Secretary be read.

Mr. HOAR. If there can be a case stated under the rules of the Senate of a proposition more clearly out of order, it would puzzle the ingenuity of my friend from Missouri to state.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri if this does not contain an appropriation and does not contain general legislation of what practical use is it?

Mr. COCKRELL. The appropriation has already been made. The appropriation takes a certain amount of money out of the annuity fund which will exhaust that annuity. Now this simply gives the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior a discretion in regard to paying the whole amount at one payment or paying it in five, six, or ten years.

Mr. DAWES. A discretion which they have not now by existing law, but will have by force of some legislation in this amendment. That is what I call independent legislation.

Mr. VEST. I am not an expert in parliamentary law, but if I understand the principles of the rule the amendment is in order. What is the rule the Senator from Kentucky invokes against it? It is in this language:

No amendment shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, &c.

Now, sir, this amendment neither increases an appropriation nor adds an item. There is not a dollar of increase in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection of the Senator from Kentucky is based on rule 29.

Mr. VEST. That rule is:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the point.

Mr. VEST. I say it does not come under that objection. It is not general legislation. Here we have appropriated already by an act of Congress fifty odd thousand dollars to be taken out of the 5 per cent. fund of these Indians. It does not come out of the Treasury of the United States, but comes from the Indians. The Secretary ascertains that if he takes thirty-odd thousand dollars from one of these tribes it will leave them without a dollar for their annual supplies, and they will immediately go upon the war-path. He suggests to Congress that they simply give him the discretion to distribute this appropriation over several years instead of paying it all out in any one year. That is not general legislation, I submit. It is simply a direction to one of the officers of the Government in regard to legislation already had; simply directing him, telling him that he may make this payment in three, four, five, or ten years if he pleases, instead of exhausting the fund of the Indians by $30,000 at one time. The amendment I think is in order, and I submit that the Senate should overrule the point made by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Interior be read.

Mr. BECK. Is it in order to have that letter read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. COCKRELL. Send it to me and I will convince the Senator from Kentucky that it is in order to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposition is debatable, and the Chair supposes the reading of the letter is in order as debate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will read it myself:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March, 2, 1881.

SIR: I inclose herewith an item of appropriation for insertion in the sundry civil or deficiency appropriation bill, now pending before Congress, to reimburse the United States for such sum as may be appropriated for the Kiowa and Comanche and Sioux tribes of Indians for the sum taken from their annuities under the provisions of Senate bill No. 1181.

Very respectfully,

C. SCHURZ,
Secretary.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL,
United States Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Missouri the date of that letter?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is dated to-day.

Mr. BUTLER. That is very remarkable. I ask why has not that communication been made earlier, and to the Senate instead of the Senator? I confess I do not comprehend it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yesterday I had a letter from the Secretary of the Interior conveying a letter from the Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs, addressed to the House Committee on Appropriations; and I was advised that the same came to the Senate Committee on Appropriations, a letter prepared by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, addressed to the Secretary of the Interior, and by him communicated to the two Committees on Appropriations, the one in the Senate and the one in the House. This bill only passed the House three or four days ago. The measure diverting the annuities passed the Senate early in the session. As soon as the Secretary's attention was drawn to it he sent for me. I called upon him yesterday and was advised in regard to it; and I understood him—I know I saw a copy of the letter sent to the Committee on Appropriations of the House—that he had sent a copy of the same to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate. I do not know whether they received it or not. Then it was that he made the suggestion and said he would communicate with me, and the letter I have read was sent and received this morning. There is no opportunity of referring it to the Committee on Appropriations. I never thought anybody would object to this amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator state why the House Appropriations Committee did not adopt the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill was already in the Senate. The letter of the Secretary of the Interior was sent yesterday, and the sundry civil bill was then here. The bill to which this refers passed the Senate last session, but only passed the House a few days ago. It appropriates a certain amount out of the annuities of these Indians. If that amount is all paid this year, it absorbs the whole fund. If the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury can regulate it they will withhold the amount and pay it so that no harm will be done to these Indians. That is all there is in it. The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs recommend it, and it is perfectly correct.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator think this amendment is in order under the rule?

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it is, and I think I can show half a dozen decisions of the Senate that just such amendments are in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is whether the point of order made by the Senator from Kentucky is well taken.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Chair to state the question again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has raised the point of order on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, that it proposes general legislation to a general appropriation bill, and the question as stated by the Chair now is, Is the point of order well taken?

Mr. CONKLING. Those who vote in the affirmative vote that the point of order is well taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And those who believe it is not vote in the negative.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Now let the amendment be read.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It has been read half a dozen times.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Nebraska persists the Secretary will again read the amendment.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 25, noes 14.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate decides that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. BUTLER. I move now, on page 58, line 1657 to 1662 inclusive——

The CHIEF CLERK. From line 1657 to 1662 the Committee on Appropriations reported to strike out the following words:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to the officers and employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual roll on the 1st day of July, 1880, one month's extra pay at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available.

Mr. BUTLER. I move——

Mr. BECK. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The Chair has not heard the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion the Chair will hold is not now in order. It will come up when the bill is reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I reserve it for that occasion.

Mr. GARLAND. I ask leave now to call up the amendment of which I gave notice. On page 54, line 1310, after the word "dollars," I move to insert:

Provided, That in addition to the duties of the Director of the Geological Survey as now prescribed by law, he may extend his examination of the geological structure and mineral resources and products into the respective States when requested by the authorities thereof.

Mr. BECK. I make the point of order that that is legislation.

Mr. GARLAND. I have the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas submits his amendment.

Mr. GARLAND. I have the floor upon it and wish to say a few words.

This is the substance, in fact almost the identical language of a joint resolution passed by the House of Representatives, and that has for some time been on the table of the Senate. It simply asks that the Director of the Geological Survey may extend his work into the States, examining into their mineral resources and products upon the request of the authorities of the States. It does not compel him to go there, does not say he shall go there, but simply that he may go when he is invited to go by the authorities of a State.

If I had the time to read the report of the Director of the Geological Survey, I believe I could convince the Senate that this is a very necessary piece of work specified in this amendment. It does not ask for any additional sum to be appropriated, but it simply asks that these may be put upon him as additional duties when the authorities of a State request it. Its importance cannot well be overestimated to many States. A number of them have attempted to make geological surveys, and a number of them have failed because they have not the ability and means to make those surveys.

I will not undertake to detain the Senate now by going into details on this proposition, but I hope the Senator from Kentucky will not feel it his duty to make the point of order upon the amendment, because it was offered several days ago, printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and they had every opportunity, and I suppose they exercised the privilege they had, to look into this matter and consider it. I hope the Senate will come to a direct vote on the proposition.

Mr. BECK. I make the question of order that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question of order is made by the Senator from Kentucky that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas is not in order; that it is general legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I want to vote intelligently on this subject. While I am in favor of this system I do not want to violate any rule of the Senate. I ask if this amendment will change the existing law on the subject?

Mr. BECK. It would extend the authority of the Director of the Geological Survey into States where by right he cannot go, and would require the payment of half a million dollars annually instead of $150,000.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The duty of the survey is fixed by law.

Mr. BECK. It is confined to the national domain.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. This amendment proposes to extend it?

Mr. BECK. It does.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think it is general legislation.

Mr. GARLAND. I will say to the Senator from Florida that it enlarges the duties of the director of the survey. He may perform these duties in addition to the duties already imposed upon him by law, if the authorities of the State request it. It does not necessarily change any law, but throughout this whole bill we have provisions of that sort directing how the appropriations shall be expended. That is all there is of it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. This enacts a new provision of law.

Mr. WITHERS. I would suggest that if there was a provision of law now on our statute-book which would authorize this survey to be made in the States, this amendment is unnecessary; if it requires the enactment of a law to enable them to do it, it is general legislation.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand there is a director of the geological survey at the head of it. This clause appropriates $150,000 for the expenses of that bureau. The Senotor from Arkansas now proposes to say that in addition to his present duties he may do so and so. That is the whole of it. If this be general legislation in the sense of the rule, then anything—I do not care what the proposition is—that may be offered in the way of an amendment is general legislation. If this is general legislation, no amendment whatever on which a question is raised can be offered on this bill.

Mr. WITHERS. Suppose it was proposed to make the amount of $150,000 $50,000 less, would that be legislation?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is not the proposition.

Mr. WITHERS. But the Senator said any amendment would be liable to the point of order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Any amendment outside of a mere appropriation. There is a bureau in existence; there is an officer in existence. The Senator from Arkansas proposes to add to that man's duties. While to-day he is confined to the national domain it is proposed that he may survey the States with their consent. The point which I present is, that if this be general legislation nothing can be added hereafter in any form, because here exists the appropriation, here exists the bureau officer, and here exists all the machinery, and the amendment says in addition to his duties now fixed by law he may go into the States and survey them by their consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that debate upon a question of order is not allowable. The Chair has entertained the debate, as is usually done, by unanimous consent. The Chair decides, in accordance with the decision of the Senate made only a few moments ago, that this amendment is general legislation and is not in order, but will submit the question to the Senate if the Senator from Arkansas desires.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate. If the Chair decides it is out of order, I submit, though I had hoped that a matter of this great importance would have been permitted to go. There is very much legislation in the bill liable to the same objection if this is out of order.

Mr. VOORHEES. I gave notice of an amendment which I ask to have now read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 1350 it is proposed to add:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they hereby are, authorized and directed to pass to the credit of Charles H. Nicholls, late superintendent of the Government Hospital for the Insane, the sum of $3,037.09, that being the amount disallowed in his accounts; and being the difference in salary between $2,500 and $4,000 per annum from June 22, 1874, to June 30, 1876; said disallowance having been made to conform to the requirements of the Revised Statutes, section 4839, adopted June 22, 1874; and the salary of the said superintendent is hereby fixed at $4,000 per annum, as originally provided in act of March 2, 1867.

Mr. VOORHEES. This has been considered carefully by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws and unanimously reported as a bill to the Senate during the present session, and unanimously passed by the Senate. Finding, however, that it will be impossible for it to get through the House I offer it in this shape. I offer it as an amendment to this bill under the direction also of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws; so that it stands as well as a measure can for approval. The committee have kindly allowed me to offer this inasmuch as it was considered in the committee, and I have heard no objection to it. Now, if the Senate will, in view of the precious value of time, require no further explanation than this, I will stop. If not I can give the explanation of the merits of it very succinctly and plainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. We had just a moment ago an amendment offered which simply extended one step further the duties of the Director of the Geological Survey, and that was decided by the Chair to be ont of order. If that be so what is this amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nobody has raised any question of order upon it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand——

Mr. VOORHEES. I am quite sure that the amiable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will not do it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If it is not done, I suppose everybody will be coming in.

Mr. VOORHEES. But this matter has been considered by the committee, and not unfavorably.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is true, and the matter offered a moment ago had passed the House, been considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and yet it was ruled out of order.

Mr. BECK. It was not agreed to in committee.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It was reported from the committee and on the Calendar.

Mr. BECK. The amendment was not before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I referred to the joint resolution which was the basis of the amendment. I did not have reference to the amendment on this bill. If we permit this amendment, I do not see how we can prevent others, and I must raise the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia raises the point of order.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will say that that is so contrary to what I supposed of the Senator from West Virginia that I am taken by surprise, and consequently I am not as thoroughly posted on the question of order as I would have been if I had anticipated a necessity to discuss it; but I have no idea that it is out of order. It comes in connection with the provision made in the bill for the Government Hospital for the Insane. On what ground does the Senator from West Virginia say it is out of order?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senate will observe if it has listened to the amendment that it is a correction of the law. If it is correcting the law, it is certainly legislation. It is also fixing a salary at probably what it ought to be. I admit everything that the Senator can say about the merit of it; perhaps this salary ought to be fixed at this sum; but it is legislation or it would not be necessary.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let me appeal to the Senator in behalf of a measure most meritorious and necessary. Let me state the situation of this matter, and then I will leave it to the Senate to decide whether I am in order or out of order.

In March, 1867, the salary of the superintendent of the Government Hospital for the Insane was fixed at $4,000 a year. Prior to that time it had been $2,500 a year. The increasing magnitude of that great institution was such that——

Mr. WITHERS. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that the deficiency bill will be the more proper place for his amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. With the assurance given me by the chairman and other members of the Committee on Appropriations, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn. Hereafter when questions of order are raised the Chair will be compelled to decide them or submit them to the Senate, and not permit discussion further than a simple explanation of the object of the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer an amendment to come in after line 1603, on page 66:

For payment of expenses of an embassy to the government of Mexico, to consist of not more than two embassadors to act in connection with the minister plenipotentiary of the United States in Mexico, and for a secretary and a translator to attend such embassy, $25,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. BECK. The Committee on Appropriations considered that last night. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] being absent we resolved that this might be offered and so far as we were concerned no point of order would be made upon it. It was laid over in consequence of his absence, he being chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I make no point of order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I concur in what the Senator from Kentucky says.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to say that the subject of an embassy to the government of Mexico has been before the Committee on Foreign Relations during this entire Congress. A formal resolution was sent to us from the House, and also a resolution has originated in the Senate. The Committee on Foreign Relations have given very attentive and diligent consideration to this question, and are of opinion that an embassy is required by the existing state of the relations between the two governments. It is not necessary now, and perhaps not proper in open session, to go into all the reasons which have influenced the Committee on Foreign Relations. The committee have been very deeply impressed with the necessity as well as the policy of sending an embassy to the Government of Mexico to readjust our diplomatic relations with that country. There is a prospect of immense gain and service to the whole country, a prospect of the realization of the hopes of many of the people of the United States and of many in Mexico also, that our relations shall become more kindly and that there shall be reciprocal advantages of trade.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama a question. The amount named is $25,000; does he not think that large?

Mr. MORGAN. No, I do not, and I will state to the honorable Senator that after full conference with Mr. Evarts, the present Secretary of State, that amount was fixed upon as the amount which should be appropriated for such an object. The Government of the United States may not be called on to expend the amount; the Government of the United States may not find it necessary to send the embassy; but we make provision that during the summer, between now and the next session of Congress, the Government shall find itself in possession of the means to carry into effect its constitutional power if it desires to exercise it, and that is all the committee desires to accomplish.

I will state further, that in consultation with other gentlemen who I think are aware of what will be the policy of the incoming administration, this is very desirable.

Mr. EATON. I hope this amendment will be adopted by the Senate. It may be very important that this embassy should be established. It is a matter to be left to the incoming administration. If it is important that the President shall exercise the power, then he will exercise it; if it is not important he will not, and therefore no money will be expended, but the money ought to be placed at the disposal of the President. The Committee on Foreign Relations have no doubt on that subject.

Mr. MORGAN. I will modify the amendment by inserting "or so much thereof as may be necessary" after the word "dollars."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 205) granting a pension to Jacob Gelwicks;

A bill (H. R. No. 1469) granting a pension to Mary Ann McCarrol;

A bill (H. R. No. 2549) granting a pension to Edward H. Mitchell;

A bill (H. R. No. 3751) to amend chapter 198, volume 16 of the Statutes at Large;

A bill (H. R. No. 5066) to provide for the preparation of classified abridgments of all letters-patent of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 1280) to amend section 2326 of the Revised Statutes, relating to suits at law affecting the title to mining claims;

A bill (H. R. No. 440) for the ascertainment of the amount due the Choctaw Nation;

A bill (H. R. No. 802) granting a pension to Wyatt Botts;

A bill (H. R. No. 1452) for the relief of James B. Furman;

A bill (H. R. No. 2439) granting a pension to Henry Mills;

A bill (H. R. No. 2773) granting a pension to James P. Hunter;

A bill (H. R. No. 3450) for the relief of Lewis A. Kent;

A bill (H. R. No. 3789) for the relief of Homer Fellows;

A bill (H. R. No. 6248) directing the payment of certain awards in favor of parties therein named;

A bill (H. R. No. 7032) to amend the act incorporating the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company;

A bill (H. R. No. 2269) for the relief of Calvin Bronson;

A bill (H. R. No. 2437) for the relief of several persons impressed into the United States naval service;

A bill (H. R. No. 4411) to establish an additional land district in the State of Kansas;

A bill (H. R. No. 4477) to regulate the mode of purchasing tobacco for the United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 5627) to amend section 1486 of the Revised Statutes in order to preserve the meaning of the original law from which it was taken with reference to the rank of engineer officers, graduates of the Naval Academy;

A bill (H. R. No. 5832) for the relief of David W. Bell;

A bill (H. R. No. 6479) for the relief of Thomas Snell;

A bill (H. R. No. 2769) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage the establishment of public marine schools," approved June 20, 1874, so as to extend it to the ports of Wilmington, Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, New Orleans, Baton Rouge, Galveston, and in Narragansett Bay;

A bill (H. R. No. 3742) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell certain real estate belonging to the United States, and vesting the title to certain other lands in the city of Vincennes, in the State of Indiana, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 6529) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 186) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish States for the use of agricultural colleges one set of standard weights and measures.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment. At the end of line 1618 to insert:

To enable the President to execute the provisions of section 1753 of the Revised Statutes for the promotion of efficiency in the different branches of the civil service, $15,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It was conceded by the committee by a decided majority that no point of order would be made on that.

Mr. TELLER. Has the committee a right to waive the question whether it is in order under the rules?

Mr. PENDLETON. This is an amendment reported from a committee, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and after examination it was not formally agreed to there, but this morning on the floor of the Senate I consulted with a number of members of that committee and they now agree to it.

Mr. TELLER. I do not rise to raise a point of order, but it strikes me as very remarkable that the committee should raise the point of order on one Senator and not on another. Here they do not raise the point of order.

Mr. PENDLETON. It is not possible to make a point of order, for it is carrying out existing legislation.

Mr. TELLER. Then let the committee say that it is not liable to the point of order.

Mr. BECK. I know of no point of order to which it is amenable. The Committee on Appropriations did not believe it was good policy to adopt it, and therefore did not report it as an amendment, but that does not prevent its being offered by the Senator from Ohio. The committee of which he is a member adopted it and referred it to us.

Mr. TELLER. The chairman of the Appropriations Committee said it was understood no point of order should be made. That was what I wanted to call the attention of the Senate to. I do not raise any point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOOTH. I desire to offer an amendment which is clearly and unmistakably and indisputably out of order, and it can only be justified by a sovereign necessity. It is to come in as an additional section:

That section 1 of the "act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for deficiencies, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1881, is hereby amended by striking out the words "including arrears" where they occur in the second paragraph of the section, and the words "including arrears" in the seventh paragraph of said section.

The accounting officers of the Treasury at first decided positively that under the phraseology of that act as it now stands they could not pay the accruing pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812 unless these words were stricken out. They held a kind of consultation of war about it and finally came to the conclusion that they might pay them, but it was a matter of very great legal doubt and difficulty. They have prepared the amendment and ask that for abundant safety it be adopted. I know it is out of order.

Mr. BECK. I will not object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. The Committee on the Yorktown Centennial Celebration have unanimously agreed to the necessity of the purchase of the article named in the amendment which I have the honor now to present to the Senate, and the proposition has been submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, and I ask that this amendment be adopted. At the end of line 831, page 35, I move to insert:

For the purchase of a sword, bequeathed by George Washington, in his last will, to his nephew, George Lewis, and now belonging to the heirs of said George Lewis, the purchase to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, at a sum not exceeding $10,000.

Mr. BECK. I make the point of order.

Mr. WHYTE. This amendment has been unanimously recommended by the Committee on the Yorktown Centennial, and it was offered two or three days ago and sent to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky make the point of order.

Mr. BECK. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will decide that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask that the Chair submit that question to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit it to the Senate if desired.

Mr. WHYTE. I request it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland in order?

Mr. WHYTE. I desire to say that the Committee on the Yorktown Centennial unanimously recommended this purchase.

Mr. CONKLING. Is this amendment reported by that committee as an amendment to this bill?

Mr. BECK. No, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Simply offered by a Senator?

Mr. WHYTE. It was reported in a separate and distinct proposition, and, after it was offered, sent to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONKLING. And not reported by the committee?

Mr. WHYTE. No, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I shall have to vote that it is out of order, and I shall do so with the less reluctance because the Senate having voted to build a brass house with plate-glass windows in a corn-field, I think that is enough in that particular direction for this session. Certainly believing this out of order I shall vote against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the amendment in order? [Putting the question.] The noes have it, and the amendment is decided not to be in order.

Mr. HARRIS. At the end of line 593, after the word "law," I move to insert:

For the erection of buildings necessary to quarantine stations at Capello Sound and purchasing barges to convey sick, and keep channel open, and maintenance of same, $41,000.

For the erection of necessary quarantine buildings at Galveston, Texas, and purchase of vessels, and maintenance of the same, $50,000.

For the erection of buildings necessary to quarantine station at Hampton Roads, Virginia, and maintenance of same, $38,000.

Mr. WHYTE. How is that in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nobody has raised the question.

Mr. BECK. I raise every possible point as to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that it has never been the habit of any presiding officer to rule an amendment offered by a Senator out of order, although he may believe it is out of order; the question is left to the committee in charge of the bill.

Mr. WHYTE. My inquiry was made of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee offers this amendment, and the Senator from Kentucky raises a question of order upon it.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to state a single fact to the Chair. The amendment was reported from the Committee on Epidemic Diseases as an amendment to the sundry civil bill, and was two or three days ago—certainly more than one day—referred to the Committee on Appropriations. According to Rule 27 the Chair will not be able to rule it out of order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is not objectionable on that rule; but it is general legislation. It makes an appropriation, and goes on to say a building shall be built. If it does not come under the rule that has been referred to, certainly it comes under the clause about general legislation if we are consistent with what we have been doing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If it is desired, the Chair will submit the question of order to the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not desire to take any time in respect to this matter. I have no objection to the Chair ruling or submitting the question to the Senate; but it is utterly impossible to put an amendment in shape under the rules that will be in order unless this is. It is the report of a committee, reported as an amendment, sent to the Committee on Appropriations, and has been in the custody of that committee for the last two or three days.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question for my own satisfaction. Is there any law now authorizing the erection of these buildings?

Mr. HARRIS. There is not.

Mr. McDONALD. And if they are erected they will be erected by force of this amendment?

Mr. HARRIS. There is a law in existence authorizing the National Board of Health to erect buildings of this general character, not these buildings by name. The act of June, 1879, authorized them to construct quarantine buildings wherever they may be necessary. That general statutory authority exists, but not these particular buildings by name.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Let the amendment be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. HARRIS.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say one word as a matter of fact. There are the estimates of the Board of Health sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, and by him communicated to the two Houses of Congress; to that extent they are estimates.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If it be not legislation what do you want the amendment for?

Mr. HARRIS. We want the money; an appropriation is what we want.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is both legislation and an appropriation.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to assure the Senator from West Virginia that if he gives me the money I do not need legislation. I have abundant power to do all that is estimated for if he will give the money.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That shows it is not general legislation, because we only want money.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Almost anything may be done if you have the money.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It is nothing but a simple appropriation; it is not general legislation.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. This is not only general legislation but it is making an additional appropriation to a very considerable extent; and if it was not out of order, in my judgment, it ought not to be done. The Committee on Appropriations examined into this health question, gave it considerable care, and they have already advanced $50,000 over what the House appropriated for the National Board of Health.

Mr. HARRIS. I have not felt at liberty to refer to the merits of this proposition at all on the question of order; and though I do not think it proper to do so, if the Senator from West Virginia desires to debate the merits of the proposition, I am perfectly willing that we shall do that when the proper time comes. The question now is, is this amendment in order? If so, then I may have something to say in respect to the question of merit, and I can show the Senator from West Virginia that he has appropriations of millions in this bill that I think right and proper; I have no objection to them, but resting precisely upon the same principle and relating to subjects vastly less in importance than the one to which this amendment refers. I only ask for $130,000 for an object of more intrinsic value to the people of this country than other objects for which millions of dollars are appropriated by this identical bill.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, on the point of order I wish to state that the amendment offered is in my opinion distinctly within the rules of order. The twenty-seventh rule goes on to define that—

> No amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill or to add a new item of appropriation—

Which this does—

> unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate.

This has been moved by the order of a select committee of the Senate, and therefore it comes within the provisions of the rule. As to being legislation, it is no legislation; it is simply asking an appropriation in pursuance of legislation which already exists on your statute-book.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit the question of order to the Senate. Is the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee in order?

The question being taken by a division, there were—ayes 20, noes 19.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. EATON. I only want to say one word. I think this amendment comes within every rule. I am sorry to be compelled to say so, for I shall have to vote against the amendment on its merits. That is a different thing. But here is an estimate; and it is from a committee of this body.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will my friend allow me? There is no estimate that I have ever seen.

Mr. EATON. It is not necessary that there should be, but I think there has been; no matter about that, it comes from a regular standing committee, and that committee sent it to the Committee on Appropriations days ago. Therefore it is brought within the rule. I shall be compelled to vote against it on its merits, but I think it is in order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There is a question of fact about the law now existing which empowers the board to build houses, I think perhaps the Senator from Tennessee is mistaken about; no such law has been shown to me. If there was such a law the board would not want this provision.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. We want the money.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand the money is wanted, but money has been appropriated largely, I think $500,000 originally for this board, and if there is authority of law for this, why not do it out of the money already appropriated?

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if he does not know that that large sum has not been expended, only a portion of it has been expended, and without any legislative authority to expend it we cannot expend it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But I understand Senators to assume that there is authority. The head of this board has not the authority, and he comes here and asks it.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator is mistaken. We had abundant authority, and did not expend it because we were not ready to spend it at that time and are now.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator asks that the Senate go on and increase the large sum already appropriated for the Board of Health. It requires legislation to carry it out, and it does come within the general rule though it has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It certainly comes under the rule of general legislation. He wants general legislation to make the appropriation; he wants general legislation to erect the buildings; he wants it to get the land, the site, &c. General legislation has to do all these things. It certainly brings it under the clause as to general legislation in my judgment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the amendment in order? On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAMPTON, (when Mr. BOOTH's name was called.) The Senator from California [Mr. BOOTH] asked me to announce that he was paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.]

The roll-call was concluded.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Baldwin,	Eaton,	Jonas,	Vance,
Brown,	Ferry,	Maxey,	Vest,
Bruce,	Garland,	Morgan,	Walker,
Burnside,	Hampton,	Paddock,	Williams,
Call,	Harris,	Platt,	Withers.
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Slater,

NAYS—14.

Beck,	Logan,	Rollins,	Wallace,
Davis of W. Va.,	McDonald,	Saulsbury,	Whyte.
Farley,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Kernan,	Pugh,	Teller,

ABSENT—38.

Allison,	Cockrell,	Hoar,	Pendleton,
Anthony,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Bailey,	Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Randolph,
Bayard,	Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Blair,	Groome,	Kellogg,	Thurman,
Booth,	Grover,	Kirkwood,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Hamlin,	Lamar,	Windom.
Cameron of Pa.,	Hereford,	McPherson,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. BECK. I ask for a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll will be called.

Mr. TELLER. What is the use of calling the roll? We know who is here.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say that unless the bill pass to-night——

Mr. WITHERS. I raise the point of order that it is out of order to debate a motion when the roll is being called.

Mr. BECK. By unanimous consent I thought I might be allowed to make a remark.

Mr. BAYARD. By unanimous consent can I not vote on the measure the result of the vote on which has just been announced?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It cannot be done. The roll will be called; that is the quickest way.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] before leaving the Chamber a few moments since requested me to state that he was paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators are present. There is a quorum. The question recurs, Is the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee in order, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The yeas and nays were called, I believe. Now, I ask would it be in order to lay the whole matter on the table so as to get rid of it?

Mr. WHYTE. The amendment is not yet before the Senate. There is a question of order whether it shall be received.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. To save time I withdraw the point of order and move to lay the amendment on the table. That will bring us to a direct vote and settle the whole matter at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the point of order is withdrawn, and the Senator from West Virginia moves to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is obvious that it is with difficulty that a quorum is continued here, and it is not strange that it should be so. I think it would be good policy and economy of time and of strength to take a recess until eight o'clock, and then come back and finish this bill.

Mr. WITHERS. I hope the Senate will not do that. If we take a recess we shall not have a quorum here to-night, and to-morrow it will be too late to pass this bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. We shall get a quorum at eight o'clock much easier than we can get one now. I thought this bill could have been finished by this time; but if it is going to keep us two or three hours more, we had better take a recess till eight o'clock and come back and finish this bill and do other business to-night. Let me ask the managers of the bill—I desire to follow the lead of the committee—if the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from West Virginia wish us to stay here and finish the bill? And what is the purpose, then, to adjourn, or to take a recess and have a night session?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. To adjourn when we finish the bill, I hope; and to-morrow morning the committee propose to have the deficiency bill ready.

Mr. McDONALD. It is very important that we should have an executive session to-day.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say that if we take a recess now, or fail to stay here until this bill is finished, I have no expectation of its becoming a law at all; and those who desire to have this bill passed will stay here till it is done, because I know we shall have no quorum if we ever separate. I know in addition to that there are reasons to-night why a large number of gentlemen do not wish to come back.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will not press the motion, but I do not see how the Senator from Kentucky knows more than anybody else does how there will not be a quorum here at eight o'clock. We had a quorum last night.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would rather stay here four hours now than go off and come back.

Mr. WALLACE. As far as I am concerned, I do not care whether the Senate continues to sit now or takes a recess now and comes back at half past eight o'clock. There are one hundred and five cases on file in executive session. We need an executive session certainly, and I trust the Senate when it finishes this bill will go into executive session to-night in order to dispose of the executive calendar. The idea that we are to finish this bill and then to adjourn seems to me to be improper and incorrect.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I meant that so far as this bill was concerned, I was willing to adjourn when it was concluded.

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HARRIS. I call for the regular order, which is the motion the Senator from West Virginia has made to lay my amendment on the table; and in view of the very great pressure on the time of the Senate, I will not even appeal to the Senator from West Virginia to withdraw that motion so that I can give a brief explanation of the merits of the amendment I have offered. I am quite content to let the sense of the Senate be taken on his motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia to lay the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee on the table.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 28, noes 21.

Mr. BALDWIN. I desire now to offer the amendment of which I gave notice the day before yesterday. It is an amendment to come in after line 105:

Court-house, post-office, and custom-house, Detroit, Michigan: For continuation, repairs, and extension in accordance with specifications submitted by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and for the purchase of the necessary land contiguous to the land now owned by the United States and on which said building now stands, $150,000.

Mr. BECK. I make the point of order; that is legislation.

Mr. BALDWIN. I do not now intend to discuss the merits of this proposition, because the point of order has been raised. I will simply say that the amendment which I offered has received the approval of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and it has once passed the Senate.

Mr. BECK. There are just fifty-six new buildings pressed upon us. If this comes in, every other one of the fifty-six is as meritorious as this.

Mr. BALDWIN. If I am permitted to discuss the merits of the amendment, I am prepared to do so; but the point of order has been raised, and I simply state the facts and leave it there for the moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky makes the point of order that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky upon what ground he raises the point of order?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I have no right to go into the merits of the case on this motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan asks the Senator from Kentucky a question.

Mr. FERRY. I understand this to have been recommended by a committee. If that is so, it is in order.

Mr. BECK. It is legislation on an appropriation bill. It may have been before us, but I do not know that it has been.

Mr. FERRY. It is not general legislation; it is special legislation. It has been recommended by a committee and passed by the Senate once. I cannot see the force of the point of order raised by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Did I understand the Senator from Michigan to say that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds had recommended this amendment as an amendment to the sundry civil bill?

Mr. BALDWIN. No, sir, I did not say that they recommended it as an amendment to this bill, but they have recommended precisely a similar measure.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is the point. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds did in this case, as it did in a great many others equally as meritorious, provide for the construction and the repair of buildings throughout the Union, and I can say in favor of one in my own town, which passed this body, received the sanction of my committee, and of the Senate, and that is all the indorsement this proposition has received, but as an amendment it has not received the sanction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds as a distinct proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that this amendment is not in order, that it is clearly general legislation, as it provides for the purchase of grounds by the Government of the United States.

Mr. BALDWIN. I may be permitted to say one word in answer to what the Chair has said, that the amendment is not in order because it provides for the purchase of land. It provides for the purchase of a strip of land adjoining the present Government building, precisely as was recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and passed in the bill. If it is out of order for that reason, it is out of order because it is to enlarge the existing building. It is precisely in the language of the recommendation of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator desires the Chair——

Mr. BALDWIN. I simply make that point, because the Chair made it, in answer to what the Chair said. The Chair, as I understood him, decided this was out of order, not because it had not been recommended, but because it embraced a provision for the purchase of a strip of land.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair said it was clearly out of order on that ground, and he thought also it was out of order on other grounds which the Chair did not take the time to state, as that was a point very clear to the mind of the Chair.

Mr. MAXEY. From the Committee on Military Affairs, I offer the following amendment, to be inserted at the end of line 672:

For constructing bridge over the Pecos River, on the new military road, from Fort Clark, Texas, to Fort Davis, Texas, $10,000.

I desire only to say that the amendment comes by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs. Their recommendation is based upon the recommendation of the Secretary of War, which I hold in my hand, upon that of the commanding officer of the Department of Texas, upon the recommendation of the quartermaster of the Department of Texas, and upon the recommendation of the Quartermaster-General. I laid these papers before the committee myself, and I learned that afterward and without my knowledge the committee rejected the amendment upon a statement made by General Sherman, I believe. I have always heretofore thought that the Quartermaster-General and the quartermasters were the men who had to do with transportation, with bridges, &c. The action of the committee was based, as I learned, upon the idea that there would be a railroad there to supersede this. It is news to every man in Texas that there will be a railroad there within any reasonable time; for any railroad now projected in Texas will miss that route by at least fifty miles. It will pass fifty miles north of it. I have a map here. In support of the recommendation of the Quartermaster-General I will state that, as is known to everybody, the Pecos River is liable to a sudden rise of fifteen, twenty, and thirty feet in a few hours; it is on the important military road leading from Fort Clark to Fort Davis in the State, and it will be an annual saving, as the Quartermaster-General has shown, of over three thousand dollars, and the appropriation is only $10,000. The communication from the War Department is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 28, 1881.

SIR: I respectfully ask your attention to a letter of the Secretary of War and accompanying papers, in relation to laying an iron bridge over the river Pecos, on the military road lately constructed or in course of construction.

This river is a great obstruction to the transfer of troops from point to point of the frontier, and a bridge is necessary to its certain or quick passage, as well as a necessary part of the new road.

The papers referred to show that the use of this road, to which the bridge is necessary, would reduce the expense of transporting supplies enough in one year to pay for the bridge.

This question was referred to the Military Committee of the House, which unanimously reported favorably and recommended to the Committee on Appropriations to include $10,000 for this object; but to no purpose.

Most respectfully, yours,

J. E. JOHNSTON.

General S. B. MAXEY,
United States Senate.

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 7, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith certain papers in relation to bridge over the Pecos River near its mouth.

It will be seen that the brigadier-general commanding the Department of Texas asks that Congress be requested to appropriate $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in order to build a permanent iron bridge on the line of a new road between Fort Clark, via the mouth of the Pecos, to Fort Davis, Presidio del Norte, and cantonments at Peña Colorado, and Chinati Mountains; say saving seventy-five to one hundred and fifty miles in length of wagon haul, and that he is of opinion that the use of this road would save in one season more than $10,000, the cost of the bridge.

A statement of the transportation by the old route and by contract trains during the year 1879–'80 is inclosed.

About seven hundred and ninety thousand pounds were hauled to Fort Davis at a cost of $20,781.87.

Had the new route been opened, it is stated that on this hauling there would have been a saving of $3,418.37.

Nothing was sent last year to the cantonments spoken of.

I recommend that Congress be asked to make an appropriation of $10,000 for construction of a permanent iron bridge over the Pecos River on the new military road from Fort Clark to Fort Davis, Texas.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General,
Brevet Major-General United States Army.

To the honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF TEXAS,
OFFICE CHIEF QUARTERMASTER,
San Antonio, Texas, September 24, 1880.

* * * * * * *

There were transported during the fiscal year 1879–'80 by contract trains over the road which the "new road" is intended to supplant the following military supplies, namely:

From—	Miles.	Pounds.
San Antonio to Fort Davis	466	725,867
Austin to Fort Davis	492	45,824
Fort Clark to Fort Davis	340	9,159
Total		780,850

The cost of transportation of said stores over the old road at contract rates was $24,200.24. The cost of transportation of said stores by the "new road," if the same had been completed and practicable for use by freight trains, would have been as follows, namely:

From—	Miles.	Pounds.	Amount.
San Antonio to Fort Davis	397	725,867	$19,163 52
Austin to Fort Davis	477	45,824	1,453 56
Clark to Fort Davis	271	9,159	165 06
Total by new road			20,781 87
Difference in favor of new road			3,418 37

No stores were transported last year by contract trains from either San Antonio, Austin, or Fort Clark to Presidio Del Norte, Peña Colorado, or Chinati Mountains.

BENJAMIN C. CARD,
Brevet Brigadier-General, Chief Quartermaster.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, December 17, 1880.

SIR: Referring to the letter from this Department of the 15th instant, concerning the construction of a bridge across the Pecos River, in Texas, I have the honor to forward to the House of Representatives copy of a report from the Quartermaster-General, dated October 7, 1880, in which he recommends an appropriation of $10,000 for construction of the bridge.

ALEX. RAMSEY,
Secretary of War.

To the SPEAKER
Of the House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, December 15, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to the House of Representatives copies of papers received from the Quartermaster-General, showing the necessity for a bridge for military purposes across the Pecos River, in Texas, and to respectfully recommend an appropriation of $10,000 for the construction of the bridge, which sum has been approved by the Secretary of War.

Respectfully submitted,

H. T. CROSBY,
Chief Clerk, for and in the absence of the Secretary of War.

To the SPEAKER
Of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Texas states very properly that the decision was arrived at by the committee in his absence. All our decisions were arrived at in the absence of the Senators who made propositions before the committee.

Mr. MAXEY. I meant by that statement that I had no knowledge of the action of the committee.

Mr. BECK. We had proposition after proposition for building bridges, building telegraph lines, and many things were urged upon us by the heads of the different Departments of the Government. General Hazen was before us, and some other officers. Among others we sent for General Sherman, who of course was well informed about this matter. He had a map, and explained it to us as well as he could, and the committee came to the conclusion after hearing him that this bridge and quite a number of others were not needed for the military service of the United States. He seemed to be very familiar with the subject. Therefore we reported against the amendment. That is all there is in it; and in order to test the sense of the Senate, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. MAXEY. I only desire to say that I place the statements of the quartermaster who has charge in Texas and the Quartermaster-General and the Secretary of War on a little appropriation of $10,000 for a bridge which all who know anything about the country know it to be proper to construct, and that it will be missed by any railroad that may be built by fifty miles, against the verbal statements made or reported as having been made. But it is for the Senate to do as they please about it.

Mr. BECK. I move to lay the amendment on the table, and let the Senate decide it one way or the other.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEREFORD. I was about to offer an amendment to come in after the word "clerk," in line 1657, but I am informed that the clause to which my amendment relates has been stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those lines have been stricken out, and the amendment will not be in order until the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. HEREFORD. I reserve the right to ask for a separate vote in the Senate on striking out the clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment has already been reserved by some Senator.

Mr. COKE. By direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, after line 1424 I move to insert:

For the payment of the expenses of the Miami delegation from Indian Territory now in Washington, to be immediately available, to be deducted from the funds of said Miami Indians held in trust by the United States, $1,500.

Mr. BECK. That is precisely similar to the amendment that we inserted from line 1425 to 1432 relating to the Peoria and other Indians. It was omitted, and it ought to be inserted in my opinion.

Mr. COKE. Do I understand that the amendment is accepted?

Mr. BECK. As far as I am concerned. The Senate can do as it likes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Texas, [Mr. COKE.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COKE. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to propose the following amendment, to be inserted in line 1416, after the word "Indian:"

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to expend so much of the fund belonging to the eastern band of Cherokee Indians arising under the act of Congress approved March 29, 1848, now to their credit on the books of the Treasury under the act of Congress approved August 15, 1876, as may be necessary to pay the expenses of such members of said band as have removed or may hereafter remove and unite with the Cherokees in the Indian Territory, as provided in the treaty of December 29, 1835, with the Cherokee Indians: Provided, That the amount so used shall not exceed the sum of $53.33 for each person so removing.

One word in explanation of this amendment. It is offered by instruction from the Committee on Indian Affairs. It has been before the Committee on Appropriations. It is asked for by the Secretary of the Interior and by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in furtherance of a well known policy of the Government of the United States to encourage the emigration of the North Carolina Cherokee Indians to the Indian Territory. The amendment is for the purpose of paying the expenses of those Indians now desirous of going West. It is an appropriation out of their own money, and I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that we had the letter of the Secretary of the Interior before us, and we sent for the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. He appeared before us, and we talked over this matter as fully as we could in the hurry of many other things. I think the number of Indians was stated at sixteen or eighteen, very few at any rate, and he said it was not important enough to make much difference about it one way or the other, and we discarded the amendment because it was deemed rather unimportant.

Mr. COKE. It was of sufficient importance to justify the writing of a voluminous letter from the Interior Department to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is at the suggestion of the Interior Department that this amendment is offered, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Do I understand the Senator, as chairman of the committee, to recommend it? Has he examined it?

Mr. COKE. I submit the amendment by instruction of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Texas, [Mr. COKE.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. It will make no difference to the Senator from Texas to insert the amendment after line 1424, so as not to separate it from the other?

Mr. COKE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment just agreed to will be inserted after the other amendment if there be no objection.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to offer an amendment. After line 813 I move to insert:

For construction of a two-story stone warehouse, 43 feet by 155 feet, at San Antonio arsenal, Texas, $14,000.

For construction of a shed for artillery carriages at same arsenal, $2,455.

For construction of one set of officers' quarters, same arsenal, $8,000.

I desire to state that all those items are estimated for. The Chief of Ordnance says in regard to all three that they are absolutely necessary and have been so for years. His letter is as follows:

ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 25, 1881.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed estimates for San Antonio arsenal are taken from the Book of Estimates, pages 128 and 129. Before the House sub-committee on the sundry civil bill I urged an appropriation for the erection of buildings at that arsenal to replace the old and worn-out. The last three items, for warehouse, artillery shed, and quarters, are absolutely necessary and have been so for years.

The arsenal was inspected by Colonel Benton last spring and he reported to this effect. Speaking of the wooden sheds for storage of ordnance stores, he says:

"Besides being unsafe these storehouses are not even extensive enough for the present wants of the arsenal. To meet not only the present wants but the probable future wants, these storehouses should be replaced as rapidly as possible by others larger and more substantially built."

He recommends the following new buildings: 3 storehouses, 150 feet by 40 feet; 1 artillery shed 150 feet by 35 feet; 2 new shops, (carpenter's and saddler's;) 1 set officers' quarters.

He had to recommend the removal of certain guns, carriages, &c., to relieve the storehouses, "owing to their crowded condition."

The quarters now occupied are old and in bad condition and not worth the cost to place them in proper repair. An expert examination of them showed that it would take at least $2,000 to repair them "so that a person could live in it with safety. Such an amount could be spent every two or three years." Captain Phipps, commanding, reports "that they are old, unhealthy from dampness, and need at the present time extensive repairs. It would be wisest to build anew rather than waste money in continual repairs."

I have the honor to bring this matter to your notice. - General Ord, while here recently, urged me to get an appropriation of not less than $40,000 for buildings at that arsenal, and he considered new erections of great necessity, and the arsenal itself of the first importance to that frontier.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. V. BENÉT,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance.

Hon. S. B. MAXEY,
United States Senate.

The estimates are as follows:

Estimates of appropriations required for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

[Estimated amount required for each detailed object of expenditure.]

San Antonio arsenal, San Antonio, Texas:

Construction of a two-story stone warehouse, 43 feet by 155 feet..... $14,000 00

[NOTE.—The present storehouses are one-story wooden structures, and of insufficient capacity; two of them (built by the confederates during the war) are so rotten that they should be torn down. A commodious and fire-proof building for the storage of the valuable property kept here should be at once provided.]

Construction of a shed for artillery carriages..... 2,455 00

[NOTE.—The artillery carriages, caissons, &c., are at present parked out of doors, there being no building suitable or available for their shelter.]

Construction of one set of officers' quarters..... 8,000 00

[NOTE.—The only quarters for officers is a building built thirty years ago, originally poorly built, and of poor material. It is very much out of repair, and should be torn down and a new one built in its place. The commanding officer of this arsenal, being also chief ordnance officer of the department, should have an assistant to relieve him of the responsibility of money and property, so that he could be at liberty to make inspections at posts in the department at all times. A second set of quarters should therefore be provided.]

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, one word before the vote is taken. The buildings the amendment is proposed to construct will be needed as long as the boundaries of the United States remain as at present fixed. So long as the Rio Grande is our southern boundary, so long will buildings of this character be needed at San Antonio. They ought to be permanent and enduring; it is true economy to have them so. The buildings now there to supply which we seek an appropriation are miserable, untenantable shanties. The report of the officer in charge is the evidence on which I base this allegation. This report is not controverted, indeed is admitted to be true. Why not, then, in view of the necessity for buildings of this character at San Antonio, and of the fact that we will always need the buildings estimated for, because San Antonio must continue to be Army headquarters, expend money enough at once to build proper enduring structures, such as will last and do the service we all know will be required of them in the future. I hope the amendment of my colleague will be adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish to ask the Senator from Texas how much did we appropriate last year?

Mr. MAXEY. I see of course the chairman of the committee does not understand the case. The headquarters of the Department of Texas is one thing. For that an appropriation has been made, and it is at least three miles from the arsenal. The arsenal and arsenal grounds furnish all the ordnance and ordnance stores for the entire Department of Texas. The Chief of Ordnance, not only in the letter I have read, but personally came to me to see about it, and I know the quarters myself. He says these three buildings are absolutely necessary to protect the arsenal, which he says is one of the best constructed arsenals in the United States; but of course I take it for granted the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. BECK. I have only to say that we sent to the heads of all the Departments and endeavored to get all the information we possibly could.

Mr. MAXEY. Here is the letter I read.

Mr. BECK. I know the letter of General Benét was read and there were statements on all sides, and we thought this of no more importance than other propositions that were urged, and did not see fit to recommend it. It is for the Senate to do what they like with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 12, noes, 19; no quorum voting.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the Senator from Texas will consider that to be the sense of the Senate, and by unanimous consent let us get along with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask for a further division?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No question is raised.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has not announced the result of the count officially.

Mr. MAXEY. I do not ask for any further division. I took it for granted that I should get beaten when I began, because it is too good a case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment fails.

Mr. MORGAN. At the end of line 1618 I move to add:

For printing and distributing monthly the publications by the Department of State of the consular and other commercial reports, including circular letters to chambers of commerce, $10,000.

I desire to say in reference to this amendment that the Secretary of State was not in Washington at the time that the committee of the House had this bill under consideration. The House made an appropriation in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill of $7,000 for the printing of the monthly consular reports. The Senate added $8,000 to that appropriation, making it $15,000. Thereupon the Secretary of State on his return from New York finding that the appropriation had only gone up to $15,000 submitted a special estimate, which was laid before the Committee on Appropriations, in which he asked for $20,600, giving credit for the $15,000 which he supposed would be appropriated by Congress. When the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill went into conference that imperium in imperio struck out the $8,000 and let the appropriation down to $7,000. I move now to add $10,000, so that the appropriation will be $17,000, which is nearly $4,000 short of the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

I desire to say what I suppose is known to every Senator here, that the publication monthly of the consular reports is not only a very attractive manner of giving information as to our condition abroad, but the commercial men throughout the United States are seeking with great avidity for this publication. We are the only government in the world that communicates to our mercantile community monthly reports of consuls in all the different ports of the earth, and this information coming from these consular officers at foreign ports is stimulating trade and industry of every kind and increasing our commerce more rapidly than any agency we have resorted to in very many years. It is equal to a line of ships almost running back and forth between a port of this country and foreign ports.

I therefore ask that the Senate vote this appropriation of $10,000, which, added to the $7,000 in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, will make the appropriation only $17,000, which the Secretary of State urgently recommends, because he says that he urges us to give him the money to carry on this work.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the addition will be made. I know of no publication on the part of Congress that is so valuable as these consular reports. I believe they are printed throughout the whole country. I trust the amendment will be unanimously agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADDOCK. After line 1230 I move to insert:

For reimbursement to persons who have taken under the homestead or other laws, by homestead settlement, purchase, or otherwise, from the United States, lands within the limits of a grant of lands made in pursuance of an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas Railroad and Telegraph," approved July 23, 1866, and to whom or to whose grantees patents therefor were issued, and against whom or whose grantees afterwards a decree has been, or shall be, recovered in the circuit court of the United States setting aside such patent on account of the priority of the grant hereinbefore recited, $50,000, or so much thereof as shall be required: Provided, That when there shall be filed in any such case with the Secretary of the Interior a certified copy of such decree, together with a certificate of the judge of the court making the same, to the effect that the said decree was recovered in a bona fide controversy between a claimant as aforesaid from the United States direct and a claimant under such grant to the State of Kansas for the Northern Kansas Railroad and Telegraph, he shall adjust and make his requisition on the Treasury for the payment of the same to such original claimant or his grantee, on the basis of $2.50 per acre for each tract the patent for which was canceled and set aside as aforesaid.

Mr. BECK. That is clearly general legislation. I make the point of order that it is new legislation.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky raises the question of order that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. PADDOCK. I suppose I shall be obliged to submit, although I regret exceedingly to be compelled to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that the amendment is not in order. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole be acted on separately or all together?

Mr. BECK. All together, unless there is objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One amendment has been reserved. If no further amendment is reserved it will be the only one, and the question is on concurring in all the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole with that exception.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment which was reserved will now be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out the following clause, from line 1657 to line 1662, inclusive:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to the officers and employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual roll on the 1st day of July, 1880, one month's extra pay at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, striking out the clause which has been read?

Mr. BECK. May I be allowed to say a word? The House inserted a provision to pay their employés thirteen months for twelve months' work. That is the whole of it. Many of their employés now are paid more for twelve months' work than the corresponding officers of the Senate are receiving for twelve months' work. The House has been trying for years to cut down the pay of the employés of the Senate, holding us in conference night after night to force us to do it. We have said to them, "You may do what you please at your end of the Capitol; we will not interfere with you in increasing the pay of your employés; but we are not going to cut down the pay of our employés at your dictation." They have taken this indirect mode of increasing the pay of their employés by adding a month to the year. They refuse to regulate the pay of their own employés in such a way as they ought, but insert a provision in the sundry civil bill adding a month's pay to all their employés. Our objection is that if they are going to increase the pay of their employés they should do it directly; that they should do it in a fair way.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Why should discrimination be made between the employés of the House and of the Senate?

Mr. BECK. It should not be, and therefore we struck out the clause.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If there was no other objection to it than that, I should vote against it. They undertake to make provision for the employés in one end of the Capitol and leave the employés at this end out.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky if he knows of any instance where an extra month's pay has been given to annual clerks or to clerks who receive a whole year's compensation?

Mr. BUTLER. It certainly has been done in the Senate.

Mr. BECK. I think we did it once, but I cannot tell exactly when—never more than once, and it never ought to have been done.

Mr. BUTLER. It was done July 1, 1879.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. And that is the only time it ever was done.

Mr. BUTLER. This provision of the bill inserted by the House, as I understand, is in pursuance of that provision of July 1, 1879. The Senator from Kentucky says that he does not desire to interfere with the House in the regulation of the salaries of its employés. If that be the case, what right have we to strike out this provision from the bill? The House sent it here to us in order that the appropriation might be made, and what right have we to strike it out, unless we determine to interfere with the House in the regulation of the pay of its employés?

Mr DAVIS, of West Virginia. At this very session it will be recollected that the Senate added to the compensation of two messengers in the Secretary's office; but the Senate conferees, after holding out for several hours, had to give way to the House conferees, for they said, "We will not agree to it." This is a provision to pay thirteen months for whatever time the employés stay here, it may be four months, it may be five or six months. If the House employés get it, I believe that the Senate employés ought to have it. We have looked into the matter. I have asked employés of the House to show me precedents for it. There is one, and one only, from the beginning of the Government to the present time, and that was two years ago, I think, when we were in a contest, and House employés at that time were paid less than ours. Since then many officers of the House have been advanced beyond ours. This provision gives all House employés the thirteen months' pay without an exception. I believe there are men over there who ought to have it, but there are others who, in my judgment, ought not, because they receive higher salaries now than the corresponding employés of the Senate, and there is no excuse, in my judgment, for such a course. If the salaries are not large enough, let us increase them, but increase them fairly and properly.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 7254) supplemental to and amendatory of an act entitled "An act to facilitate the refunding of the national debt," in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt;

A bill (H. R. No. 5088) to authorize the registration of trade-marks and protect the same;

A bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) to provide for the publication of the memorial addresses on Evarts W. Farr.

SUPPLEMENTAL REFUNDING ACT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The Chair will lay before the Senate a House bill.

The bill (H. R. No. 7254) supplemental to and amendatory of an act entitled "An act to facilitate the refunding of the national debt" was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. I object to its reading more than once to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is read the first time, and lies on the table.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, the pending question being on concurring in the amendment, made as in Committee of the Whole, to strike out the following clause from line 1657 to line 1662:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to the officers and employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual roll on the 1st day of July, 1880, one month's extra pay at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available.

Mr. WALLACE. We have just as much right to vote to ourselves pay thirteen months in the year as we have to agree to this proposition. It only needs a statement of the proposition to show the principle involved, and besides here we are at the end of the session, near the 4th of March, without any extra session in prospect, and these employés will not be here until December next. This is a new thing entirely. Shall we initiate such a proposition? It needs only to be stated to be voted down.

Mr. VOORHEES. I care little about the merits of this matter, but if there is a principle involved we ought always to hunt for it. There has been always since I have been a member of Congress both in the other House and in this a constant feeling on the part of the House in regard to their employés' compensation, and it seems the Senate has the same feeling in regard to its employés.

The Senator from Florida has a feeling against the House because they undertook to regulate the pay of their own employés to suit themselves and at the same time did not say anything about our employés. It seems to me that the way to avoid trouble on the subject is for each House on this particular question to mind its own business. The House with its knowledge of its own employés can tell better what is right and proper than we can determine for them; and so we here know better how to regulate the pay of our employés than the House does, and it seems to me that the simplest way is to let each House attend to its own affairs.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let me say to my friend that if the House desire to put up the salaries of their employés, the Senate Committee on Appropriations have never objected; but when in this indirect way they propose to add to all salaries, high and low, we have objected. It is an unusual, an uncommon thing in every way. But outside of that I want to say to my friend that when the Senate undertakes to put up one of its employés to what it believes he ought to have, the House roll is brought up and we are told that we pay ours so much less than they pay theirs and that we ought to give up. This is an indirect way of making an addition to the salaries of the House employés.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am for regulating the action of the two Houses on proper principles. I am not arguing whether the House has done right or done wrong in regard to its employés, but I am stating what I think is the true principle of action as between the Houses.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Indiana. I appreciate the force of the argument which the Senator from Indiana is making so far as the authority of the two Houses is concerned to regulate their respective affairs; but we must remember that the House of Representatives is the body in which appropriation bills originate. A Senator says that is by custom. If my interpretation of the Constitution be correct, it is by right—and I think it is wise and proper that that should be so. This power conceded, whether by usage or by constitutional right, when they originate an appropriation bill, ought they not to include within it everything which in justice and in right and in law ought to be done, and send it for our concurrence?

Mr. VOORHEES. As far as they can.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Why should they leave out any matter?

Mr. VOORHEES. Let me ask the Senator from Florida would it not have been rather presumptuous if the House had said that regulation affecting its employés should include the Senate employés?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. They provide the compensation for Senators. They originate bills every session in which they provide for the compensation of Senators and employés of the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Florida knows that this is not the regular appropriation; you might as well cite the case of the President of the United States. Would it not be a strange proceeding if they were to come here regulating the pay of the Senate employés?

Now, I want to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question. We strike out what they do in regard to their employés; I do not stop to consider whether they have done right or wrong, but I do not want to put blame on the House when it is unjust. Suppose the House of Representatives, looking over this whole bill, find an amendment proposed by the Senate committee, acted upon by the Senate, on page 67:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay George W. Harrison additional for services as assistant clerk to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, $400.

That is, $400 additional. We do that; that is the Senator's act in reference to one of the clerks of his committee. I have no doubt it is right; I find it here.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It was not put there by me. I am sorry the Senator has brought it in.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not say it was. I said he is clerk of the committee, and the committee has done that. Why is the Senator sorry that I have seen fit to refer to it? I do not know that there is any impropriety in speaking of it. I do not know of anything that hedges this amendment in from discussion any more than any other amendment. I have no doubt that it is right. If the Senator from West Virginia is sensitive on the subject I see no reason for that. I say $400 additional is provided for this clerk, and it expressly says "additional," and it is brought here as an amendment of the Senate Committee on Appropriations. Would not the House have as much right to resent that as we to resent what they have done for their clerks? That is all I wish to say on that point.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As to the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, the facts are these: the salaries of the two assistant clerks of the respective Committees on Appropriations is $1,600. By some hook or crook a year ago they got only $1,200 each; and hence this provision in this bill.

Mr. BECK. I can explain that. They were made sixteen-hundred-dollar clerks at the extra session, but the President vetoed that bill, and therefore they did not get it. The House added theirs, and we have added ours to get clear of the reduction caused by the vetoed bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. One word further. I want to state to Senators the condition your committee of conference will be in provided the Senate disagrees with the committee in striking out this clause. How will it be? I believe if the House employés have an extra month's pay the Senate employés ought to have it. Suppose you disagree with the Committee on Appropriations, what will be the result? The result will be that the Senate employés cannot get it because when we go in conference you have agreed to the House proposition, and the Senate cannot do anything at all; the conferees will have no authority over our employés. But suppose somebody was to offer here now to put it upon this bill that the Senate employés should have the addition, what would be the result? The result would be that we would not have control of theirs and they would have control over ours. The only thing the Senate can do is to give them a fair chance and leave it to the committee; and so far as I am concerned—and I believe I shall be on the conference committee according to usage, and if I am I shall contend that if the House employés get the addition, the Senate employés ought to have it. That is the only way to secure equality.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, some years ago the House of Representatives undertook to strike out from an appropriation bill an appropriation of this character which the Senate had made for its own employés. The Senate objected to the amendment and there was a conference, and there was very earnest discussion in both branches. The Senate most strenuously insisted that the question of the compensation of its own servants was a question that must be left solely to the discretion of the Senate, and that it was a violation of legislative courtesy between the two branches for the House to undertake to meddle with them at all, and the House finally agreed to that view of it, abandoned its claim, and it was the view taken by the leading members of the House who discussed it at that time. The Senate having maintained against the original questioning of the House that opinion and that claim, the House having yielded to it, it would be doubly improper for us to undertake now to meddle with the House of Representatives in the exercise of its discretion.

The Senator from West Virginia says that if the House assigns to its employés a month's extra pay, or raises their pay, the Senate employés will have the same right. That is a matter which has no connection with or relation to this question.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Is it not justice to do it?

Mr. HOAR. I have the floor, I believe. It is a question which has no relation to our action with reference to this House provision. We may cut the employment of our servants down; we may raise it; we may give them extra pay or we may give them half pay, and we shall do that in accordance with our sense of the value of their services to the public interest and the interest of this body, without considering what the House of Representatives pay their employés, any more than we should consider what is paid to its employés by the Legislature of the State of Maryland. That is the only attitude we ought to occupy upon this question. Whether our employés will be dissatisfied at getting less than the House pays, or whether the House employés will be dissatisfied if we pay more, is a question which does not enter into this consideration at all.

If the House of Representatives think fit to make a certain compensation to its officers, we owe it to them to take that proposition without question. I do not mean that if the House should go into an extravagant course of expenditure on that subject; but it is not to be considered or supposed for a moment that the House will do that. Respect for that body requires us to assume as a matter of course that they know what ought to be done. Their judgment is final. That, as I say again, is the attitude which the Senate maintained against the House and which the House yielded to five or six years ago.

Mr. HEREFORD. I agree with what the Senator from Massachusetts has so well said, that the House of Representatives has a right, within the bounds of reason, to fix the pay and salary of their own employés. That is conceded by my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The only ground of objection he has is the manner in which they attempt to do it. If they have a right to say what their employés shall be paid, they also have an equal right to say in what manner they shall get at that. They propose to get at it in this way: they propose to give their employés one additional month's pay, and, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, as a matter of courtesy, we ought to yield that to them, and I do yield it to them.

Now, my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has said leave this to the conference committee. He says if you take the House bill as it came to us we are in their power; but, he says, leave it to the committee, and if they get that in, then we on the committee of conference will bring the Senate employés up to the same standard. That he cannot do, because a committee of conference has no jurisdiction except over the matters in dispute between the two Houses, and if there is no matter in dispute in regard to the Senate employés the committee of conference have no power over them. They have no right in a committee of conference to insert a new item in a bill. There is no amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations proposing to change the pay of the Senate employés, and the committee of conference would not have that matter before them at all.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think there has been a little confusion thrown around this subject by the very ingenious statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not concur in the view expressed by that Senator that this amendment proposes to fix the salaries of the officers of the House. If it were a question relating to the fixing of the salaries of the officers of that body, I would agree to everything that he said; but it is not that kind of a question. The salaries of the officers of the House are already fixed; the salaries of the officers and employés of the Senate are fixed. The House here comes to deal with the subject of a bounty, for it is nothing but a bounty; it is a bounty for no consideration, because the law has already prescribed the rate of pay of these men——

Mr. MORRILL. Allow me. It is a bounty of thirteen months' wages for the services of three.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That may be.

Mr. MORRILL. It is setting a very bad precedent.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. But I say it is not fixing the pay of these officers, as was argued by the Senator from Massachusetts with so much plausibility. The appropriating body at the other end of the Capitol—and I know the rule stands which prevents me from alluding to it, but I cannot see how I can avoid doing so at this time—when it came to originate this appropriation bill thought proper to give a bounty to its own officers outside of their regular pay, and having control of the whole subject of extending it to the employés of the Senate, they manifested no disposition to extend the same rights to the employés here. It is not a question of the fixing of salaries. If that was the question I should say at once I would not draw in question the right of the House of Representatives to fix the pay of its own employés; but I say their pay is already fixed. When, however, that House undertakes to deal in bounties and exercise the power of disposing of the people's money in that way, common justice requires that they should extend the same bounty to the employés of the Senate that they extended to their own.

Mr. HEREFORD. I rise to a question of order. Will it be in order before the Senate acts upon the proposition made by the committee to strike out the lines indicated, to offer an amendment to that, so as to perfect the text?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) It is always in order to perfect the text proposed to be stricken out before the question is taken on striking out.

Mr. HEREFORD. Then, in order to perfect it, I offer this amendment——

Mr. MORGAN. Will the honorable Senator from West Virginia allow me to ask for a reading at length of the supplemental funding bill that has just come from the House of Representatives?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama demands the reading at length of a House bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I waive that for the present.

Mr. HEREFORD. Go on and read my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 1657, before the word "clerk," it is proposed to insert "Secretary of the Senate and the," and in line 1658, before the word "House," to insert "Senate and;" so that the clause shall read:

> To enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House to pay to the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives borne on the annual roll on the 1st day of July, 1880, one month's extra pay at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available.

Mr. BECK. I move to lay that amendment on the table.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will the Senator hear me one minute?

Mr. BECK. We have been here hours now. Will the Senator renew the motion?

Mr. HEREFORD. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would hold the Senator from West Virginia is entitled to the floor for the present.

Mr. HEREFORD. If my amendment is adopted, then what my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, seeks to accomplish in committee of conference can be accomplished. Then our conferees can say to the House, "We will not agree to increase the pay of your clerks unless you yield the same thing to us." If we wish any power over the committee of conference on the part of the House, we have it in this way, and I hope the Senate will adopt this amendment of mine to put the employés of the Senate and House upon an equal footing.

Mr. DAVIS, or West Virginia. I think my colleague aims at the same thing I do, but I think we shall miss it if we add his amendment and agree to the House proposition. What is the result? The House provision has been agreed to and not ours, and therefore we cannot affect the House proposition, and they can strike out ours.

Mr. BECK. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations to strike out the clause.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 20, noes 15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. BUTLER. It seems to me the best way to get at a result is to have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment to strike out lines 1657 to 1662.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the Senate will agree with the committee to strike this clause out, then my colleague may get the conferees to add his amendment. That will give the committee of conference jurisdiction over the whole. Otherwise it cannot be done.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Anthony,	Eaton,	McDonald,	Saulsbury,
Bayard,	Groome,	McMillan,	Slater,
Beck,	Harris,	McPherson,	Teller,
Brown,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Wallace,
Burnside,	Hill of Georgia,	Platt,	Withers.
Conkling,	Kernan,	Plumb,
Davis of W. Va.,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,

NAYS—21.

Blair,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Bruce,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Walker,
Butler,	Hoar,	Pendleton,	Williams.
Call,	Ingalls,	Pugh,
Coke,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Garland,	Lamar,	Vance,

ABSENT—28.

Allison,	Cockrell,	Hamlin,	Randolph,
Bailey,	Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Saunders,
Baldwin,	Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Sharon,

Booth,	Farley,	Kellogg,	Vest,
Cameron of Pa.,	Ferry,	Logan,	Whyte,
Cameron of Wis.,	Grover,	Paddock,	Windom.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HEREFORD. I now offer an amendment to come in immediately after line 1656:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay the officers and employés of the Senate borne on the annual roll on the 1st day of July, 1880, one month's extra pay at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available.

Mr. BECK. I move to lay that on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. There is a verbal amendment which should be made on page 53. In line 1287 the word "connection" should be "correction."

Mr. BECK. That ought to be "correction."

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Without objection, that amendment will be made.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. WALKER. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer an amendment. The amendment is a bill passed by the Senate to reimburse the Creek orphan fund.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Arkansas that no amendment is now in order unless by reconsidering the vote ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. WALKER. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas moves to reconsider the vote ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. McDONALD. I think the amendment had better be reported for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas will send up his amendment to be read by the Clerk.

Mr. KERNAN. The Senator from Arkansas was on his feet, and was not heard by the Chair, before the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 26, after line 629, the proposed amendment is to insert:

That the sum of $251,055.97 be, with 5 per cent. interest on $176,755.97 from April 6, 1872, and the same is hereby, appropriated, for the purpose of reimbursing the Creek orphan fund, which sum has been diverted from the said fund and is due to the Creek orphans and their heirs, under the treaty of March 24, 1832: Provided, Said sum shall, in the discretion of the President, be paid to the Creek orphans and their heirs under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain who are entitled under the aforesaid treaty of March 24, 1832, and the provisions of this act, to receive the money hereby appropriated; and it shall be his duty to see that said moneys shall be paid to the actual beneficiaries under said law, the orphans and their heirs, to the exclusion of all claims by attorneys for fees, except such reasonable attorneys' fees as shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior after the passage of this act: Provided further, That all bonds heretofore purchased with moneys belonging to this fund shall be the property of the United States: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and instructed to charge the sum of $69,956.68 used for general purposes of the Creek Nation against the general fund of said nation, and said sum shall be retained by the secretary of the nation in such installments as shall not seriously embarrass the object of the annual appropriations for the support and necessities of the Creek Nation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading?

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] now offers the amendment which has just been reported.

Mr. WALKER. Just one word, Mr. President. The claim upon which this amendment is founded has been twice favorably passed upon by the Interior Department, twice by the Department of Justice, and at the present session a bill identical with the amendment has passed by this body. There is no certainty of its being reached in the House, and I do hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is clearly out of order. It is general legislation, if we ever had such. I do not know but what it has great merit; I will say nothing about the merits of it. The Senate has discussed it half a dozen times, I believe, in different forms; but it is general legislation, and I make the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is general legislation, and is therefore not in order, but will submit the question to the Senate if the Senator from Arkansas or other Senators desire that it shall be so submitted.

Mr. WALKER. I desire the question to be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair submits the question to the Senate, "Is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas in order?"

The question being put, was decided in the negative.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

FRANKLIN TRAVIS.

Mr. KERNAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BAILEY. I trust the Senator will withdraw that for a moment.

Mr. KERNAN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. There is a bill on the Calendar which has been passed by the House of Representatives and has received the unanimous approval of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, and I ask that it may be considered. It will take but a moment.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 688) for the relief of the sureties of Franklin Travis was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report? If there is, I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk informs the Chair there is no written report from the Senate committee, but there is a House report adopted by the Senate committee.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us hear that.

Mr. VOORHEES. The House report was adopted as the report of the Finance Committee of the Senate, and it is based on a recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Sherman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas desire the report to be read?

Mr. VOORHEES. It is somewhat lengthy, and the bill is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasury officials are for it.

Mr. INGALLS. Here is a bill that proposes to release the sureties upon somebody's official bond without stating the circumstances or the amount affected or whether the measure has received the approbation of the officers of the Treasury Department.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have stated that fact.

Mr. INGALLS. We certainly ought to know something about that before we are called upon to vote on it.

Mr. BAILEY. There is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury approving the passage of the bill and I ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 1, 1881.

SIR: Upon further examination of the bill (H. R. No. 688) in connection with the report of the Committee on Ways and Means thereon, I wish so far to modify my letter of the 23d ultimo to you as to recommend the striking out of the recitals of the bill, leaving it to stand upon the facts presented in said report. The objection to the passage of the bill that impressed me was the effect of these recitals upon other cases. Without the recitals and upon the equities stated in the report the Department can see no reason why the bill should not pass.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary.

Hon. THOMAS F. BAYARD,
Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection.

Mr. HOAR. Are the recitals referred to stricken out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Committee on Finance recommend an amendment striking them out. They are in the preamble, which has not been reached yet.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. HOAR. Is the preamble stricken out?

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I reported the bill and reported it in exact accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. The recitals are stricken out. The amendment is to strike out all the recitals.

Mr. HOAR. I have not heard any such question stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Massachusetts that the recitals referred to by the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury are in the preamble. That will be considered after the bill has been acted upon.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was read, as follows:

Whereas on the 9th day of May, 1867, Joseph W. McCall, Young W. Allen, Wilburn H. Graves, Eli T. McGill, Priestly E. Parker, Henry McCall, and Jasper Ballew became the sureties of Franklin Travis, on his bond, executed on that day, as deputy collector of taxes, under an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government," &c.; and

Whereas said bond was conditioned that the said Travis would execute and discharge the duties of deputy collector according to law, and the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by the act of March 1, 1865, was the law when the bond was executed; and

Whereas, by the law at the time said sureties executed said bond, they could only be liable for the amount of certain lists returned by assessors appointed for that purpose, and under the provisions of the act of July 13, 1866, with two months' supply of stamps denoting the tax on fermented liquors; and

Whereas by an act of Congress approved July 20, 1868, the said collector was required to keep constantly on hand a large amount of stamps, and by said act his pay was changed, and the collector converted from a simple collector of assessed taxes into a public depositary of the public funds and valuables the property of the United States, and the manner of collecting and paying over changed without the consent of the sureties, and the sureties deprived of the opportunity of knowing the amount for which they were liable, he being charged with the amount of stamps deposited with him, and the risk of the sureties greatly increased without their consent; and

Whereas the said Franklin Travis fully and faithfully kept and performed all the conditions of his said bond, executed on the 9th day of May, 1867, until after the passage of the act of July 20, 1868, and then made default to about the amount of twenty-nine thousand dollars, which liability was incurred on account of stamps which could not have come into his hands under any law existing at the time said bond was executed; and it would be contrary to the principles of justice that the sureties should be held liable for the amount of said default: Therefore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Committee on Finance propose to amend by striking out the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROLLINS. Mr. President——

Mr. KERNAN. I believe I yielded the floor to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. ROLLINS. I am recognized.

Mr. KERNAN. I yielded on condition to my friend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from New York as yielding the floor.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Chair will allow me to state what I wish to accomplish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. ROLLINS. Last evening when we were considering House bills a bill was passed over on account of an objection of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] a bill of considerable importance, to enable the Metropolitan Railroad——

Mr. KERNAN. What is the question before the Senate?

Mr. ROLLINS. I have the floor, I believe, and I do not wish to be taken off my feet in this way. I do not get on it often, and I want to stand on it when I do get on it. I want the Senate to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7031) to amend the charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia.

Mr. KERNAN. Pending that I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ROLLINS. Who objects?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that the motion of the Senator from New York is in order, notwithstanding the request or motion submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire, and hence the Chair entertained it.

Mr. ROLLINS. Very well.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I wish to have the attention of my colleague for a moment. I understand him to move an executive session. I wish to say to him that for a reason which I need not state (he probably is aware of it) a good many Senators on this side are absent this evening for a social reason. There will be no objection to an executive session to-morrow or next day, but I submit that at this hour of the evening and on this particular evening when more than half the republican Senators have ventured to go away, if the purpose is to take up contested cases in executive session my colleague would scarcely select this time to make that motion. I will aid him, for one, in getting an executive session at any time when the Senate is full; but now at eight o'clock, with the condition which he sees to exist on this side, I take it he does not make his motion for the purpose of considering contested cases.

Mr. KERNAN. I would be very glad to accommodate every one. I would be very glad myself to go away this evening; but gentlemen around me think we ought to have an executive session and that I should insist on the motion.

Mr. WALLACE. There are one hundred and five cases on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. CONKLING. I regret to call my friend from Pennsylvania to order, but I do so. This is the second time that to-day in open session he has made that statement touching executive business. I need only to remind him of the rule and I do not think he will repeat the statement.

Mr. WALLACE. If that be secret I am wrong. I had no thought that any such statement as that was secret. We have persistently endeavored to get an executive session during all this week, and we have failed. Now, again we come to the Senate and ask that we have an executive session for the consideration of the business of the Senate, and it is to be postponed until to-morrow or the next day. I trust Senators will give us an executive session for half an hour this evening, and then Senators can go where they wish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TELLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. KERNAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and the roll was called.

Mr. ANTHONY, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I notice that this vote has taken a party shape. I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and I ask to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to state that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] on political questions. The Senator from Tennessee is reminded that this is a political question; therefore the Senator from Tennessee withdraws his vote.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Allow me to say that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] has already withdrawn his vote, he being paired with a member of the Senate upon political questions.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not see how it can possibly be a political question.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Allison,	Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Paddock,
Baldwin,	Conkling,	Logan,	Platt,
Blair,	Ferry,	McDonald,	Rollins,
Booth,	Hereford,	McMillan,	Teller.
Bruce,	Hoar,	Morrill,

NAYS—29.

Bailey,	Farley,	Maxey,	Vance,
Bayard,	Garland,	Morgan,	Walker,
Beck,	Groome,	Pendleton,	Wallace,

Butler,	Hamlin,	Kirkwood,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harris,	McPherson,	Whyte,
Cockrell,	Hill of Colorado,	Plumb,	Windom.
Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Saunders,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TELLER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered and taken.

Mr. ALLISON, (after having voted in the negative.) I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE,] and withdraw my vote.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to state that on political questions I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] If this is a political question, I refrain from voting on that assumption.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bailey,	Eaton,	Kernan,	Saulsbury,
Bayard,	Farley,	Lamar,	Slater,
Beck,	Garland,	Morgan,	Vance,
Brown,	Groome,	Pendleton,	Wallace,

Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Maxey,	Whyte,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Paddock,	Windom.
Coke,	Ingalls,	Platt,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ROLLINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is paired on all political questions with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON,] and as this seems to be a question of political tactics whether there shall be an executive session, and all questions arising therefrom, I announce the pair.

The result was announced—yeas 6, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—6.

Booth,	McMillan,	Morrill,	Thurman.
Hill of Colorado,	McPherson,

NAYS—30.

Bailey,	Eaton,	Lamar,	Slater,

Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Platt,

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will state his point of order.

Mr. CONKLING. Is this an announcement of the vote on the motion to adjourn merely? I was diverted for a moment. Did the Chair announce the result of the motion to adjourn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announced yeas 6, nays 30; no quorum voting. The noes have it, and the Senate refuses to adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. That was the only point I wanted to make, that it should appear that no quorum voted.

Mr. WALLACE. I move a call of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. Is not that done as of course without any vote to do it, under the rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Chair was in error in starting to put it as a question. It is the duty of the Chair to order a call of the roll. The Clerk will call the roll of the Senate.

The roll was called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call discloses the presence of thirty-four Senators, no quorum answering.

Mr. EATON. I do not know, sir, when a majority of the Senate——

Mr. INGALLS. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. EATON. Wait one moment.

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir, I will not wait one moment.

Mr. EATON. I wish you would.

Mr. INGALLS. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will state his question of order.

Mr. INGALLS. That when it is ascertained that a quorum is not present no further debate can be had upon any question.

Mr. EATON. I have not yet debated any question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is overruled, because the Chair is wholly unable to determine the object of the Senator from Connecticut, and he has a right to state——

Mr. EATON. I have the floor.

Mr. INGALLS. It makes no difference what his object his.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas is out of order; the Senator from Connecticut is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EATON. I was about to observe (and if my friend from Kansas had waited one moment he would have saved his powder) that when this Senate, a majority of which are democratic, do not choose to be here to attend to business, I see no reason why I should remain, and therefore I move that we adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BAILEY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—11.

Allison,	Bruce,	McDonald,	Rollins,
Baldwin,	Eaton,	McMillan,	Thurman.
Blair,	Ferry,	Morrill,

NAYS—30.

Bailey,	Brown,	Coke,	Garland,
Bayard,	Call,	Davis of W. Va.,	Groome,
Beck,	Cockrell,	Farley,	Hampton,
Hereford,	Maxey,	Ransom,	Wallace,
Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,	Saulsbury,	Williams,
Jonas,	Pendleton,	Slater,	Withers.
Kernan,	Pugh,	Vance,
McPherson,	Randolph,	Walker,

ABSENT—34.

Anthony,	Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Saunders,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Booth,	Grover,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Burnside,	Hamlin,	Kirkwood,	Vest,
Butler,	Harris,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Logan,	Whyte,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Paddock,	Windom.
Conkling,	Ingalls,	Platt,
Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Plumb,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the motion, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been previously ordered upon the motion of the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONKLING. And is the Chair about to have the roll called upon that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the purpose of the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. I humbly submit to the Chair that the rule requires another thing. It requires, when it has been disclosed that a quorum is not here, that the roll shall be called, as it has been, and then provides what may take place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call develops the fact that there are eleven Senators voting in the affirmative and thirty in the negative, which makes forty-one, and shows that a quorum is present. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The roll was called.

Mr. WALLACE. I desire the reading of Rule 16.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania calls for the reading of Rule 16.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will state his question of order.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senate is dividing, and nothing is in order except to announce the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken by the Senator from New York.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think that the rule requires——

Mr. CONKLING. I call the Senator from West Virginia to order, on the ground that the Senate is dividing, and nothing is in order except to declare the vote.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 2; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Bailey,	Eaton,	McPherson,	Slater,
Bayard,	Farley,	Maxey,	Vance,
Beck,	Garland,	Morgan,	Walker,
Brown,	Hampton,	Pendleton,	Wallace,
Call,	Hill of Georgia,	Pugh,	Williams,
Cockrell,	Jonas,	Randolph,	Withers.
Coke,	Kernan,	Ransom,
Davis of W. Va.,	McDonald,	Saulsbury,

NAYS—2.

Hereford,	Thurman.

ABSENT—43.

Allison,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Platt,
Anthony,	Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Plumb,
Baldwin,	Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Blair,	Ferry,	Kellogg,	Sharon,
Booth,	Groome,	Kirkwood,	Teller,
Bruce,	Grover,	Lamar,	Vest,
Burnside,	Hamlin,	Logan,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Harris,	McMillan,	Whyte,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Windom.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Paddock,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. WALLACE. It being manifest that the Senate, although full, is not willing to go into executive session, I desire to have Rule 16 read as a part of what I have to say on the subject——

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will state his question of order.

Mr. CONKLING. My point of order is that under a rule of the Senate, Rule 2, nothing whatever is in order save only one thing, namely, a call of the roll of Senators to see whether a quorum be here.

Mr. WALLACE. I rose for the purpose of making a motion, and preparatory to making the motion I desired to call the attention of the Chair and of the Senate to Rule 16——

Mr. CONKLING. I call the Senator to order. Debate is not in order. Nothing is in order but a call of the Senate or a motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from New York, not knowing the object of the Senator from Pennsylvania as to what motion he proposes to make, and in the opinion of the present occupant of the chair there being at least two motions, either one of which it would be competent for him to make, the Chair decides to hear the Senator from Pennsylvania, to ascertain what his object is.

Mr. CONKLING. That is quite right, no doubt.

Mr. WALLACE. As I said, it is manifest that we cannot obtain an executive session to-night, because gentlemen are here and decline to vote——

Mr. CONKLING. That is out of order.

Mr. WALLACE. In the condition of public business——

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator is proceeding out of order.

Mr. WALLACE. I now move (because the condition of public business requires the members of the Committee on Appropriations in their committee-room to complete the consideration of the deficiency bill) that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. That is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Allison,	Conkling,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Baldwin,	Davis of W. Va.,	Maxey,	Slater,
Blair,	Ferry,	Morgan,	Teller,
Booth,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Thurman,
Bruce,	Ingalls,	Paddock,	Wallace,
Cameron of Pa.,	Jones of Nevada,	Pendleton,	Withers.
Cockrell,	Kellogg,	Plumb,
Coke,	Logan,	Pugh,

NAYS—22.

Bailey,	Farley,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Bayard,	Garland,	Kernan,	Vance,
Beck,	Groome,	Kirkwood,	Walker,
Brown,	Hampton,	McDonald,	Williams.
Call,	Hereford,	Randolph,
Eaton,	Hill of Georgia,	Ransom,

ABSENT—23.

Anthony,	Dawes,	Johnston,	Sharon,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Vest,
Burnside,	Grover,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Hamlin,	McPherson,	Whyte,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harris,	Platt,	Windom.
Davis of Illinois,	Hoar,	Saunders,

So the motion was agreed to; and (at eight o'clock and thirty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 3, 1881.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR CARPENTER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented resolutions of the Merchants' Association, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, relative to the death of Senator Carpenter; which were read, as follows:

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the Milwaukee Merchants' Association, held February 26, 1881, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

The Merchants' Association is deeply impressed by the information of the demise of Matthew Hale Carpenter, one of the United States Senators from Wisconsin. No class of citizens place a higher value upon extraordinary abilities of a legislator than that which represents the sinews of a nation, the merchants, the commercial men of this country.

To be recognized by them as a representative of their great interests, as a statesman devising means which tend to increase the material prosperity of the country, and as an illustrious defender of the principles underlying the whole fabric of our national existence, is an honor coveted by many and enjoyed by few.

The great Senator, whose death is mourned universally over the vast continent by individuals and communities alike, irrespective of political considerations, has been recognized during his public career as such representative, and shared the honors which a grateful people willingly offer.

His family has lost that which consolation cannot repair; his friends have lost a true friend, whose happy, genial disposition will forever be missed; the State and nation have lost his mature counsel and wisdom, the results of honest devotion to his duties and a fiery patriotism and inherent love for his country—all of which may not be easily replaced.

But his family and friends, the State and the nation, have gained in his public career, in his accomplishments and acts, an example worthy of emulation, and which will be secured to coming generations when the history of our time is recorded. The Merchants' Association hereby

Resolved, That the death of Senator Carpenter is a calamity to his family and friends, and a misfortune to the city and State which he represented in the National Legislature. That the association will attend his funeral in this city in a body; that a committee of ten, including the president of the association as chairman, proceed to Chicago to meet the senatorial delegation escorting the body of the dead Senator; that during the funeral rites and ceremonies in this city, business be entirely suspended.

Resolved further, That these resolutions be engrossed on the records of the association, and an official copy submitted to the family of the deceased Senator, to the State Legislature, and to the honored body of which Mr. Carpenter was a conspicuous member.

H. M. MENDEL,
H. H. BUTTON,
J. M. CROMBIE,
C. E. ANDREWS,
Committee.

Hon. W. A. WHEELER, Washington, D. C.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the resolutions will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. GARLAND. And entered on the Journal of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. And also entered on the Journal of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with section 8 of the act of July 22, 1854, the papers in the New Mexico private land claim, No. 120, in the name of José Dominguez; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 7254) supplemental to and amendatory of an act entitled "An act to facilitate the refunding of the national debt," was read the second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the petition of H. M. Scudder and others, citizens of Brooklyn, New York, praying for the ratification of the proposed commercial treaty with China on account of the clause in it relating to the opium trade; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to present, by request, a map by John Cowdon, and suggestions explaining it, in reference to the Mississippi River. I move its reference to the Committee on Printing, that it may be printed if the committee think proper.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1830) granting a pension to Peter Grattan, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALLACE. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes. I give notice that I shall call up the bill when the morning business is completed.

ELECTRIC LIGHT.

Mr. MCMILLAN (by request) submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the expediency of the appointment of a joint committee of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and four members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to investigate the various systems of electric lights for illuminating purposes, in order that, after a careful examination into the various systems of electric lighting now in use, the Senate and House of Representatives may select for use in the city of Washington and for the Government buildings of the United States the most satisfactory as well as economical process: Provided, That all experiments shall be at the expense of the owners of the patents offering such examination.

SALLY M. BUCHANAN.

Mr. WHYTE. The other day, as the Chair will recollect, I asked the Senate to indulge me by taking up the bill granting a pension to Mrs. Sally M. Buchanan. The Senate, with almost one accord, agreed that as soon as the call of the Calendar had been run through, I should have the privilege of calling up that bill. I now ask unanimous consent to call it up.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3292) granting a pension to Sallie M. Buchanan, widow of General Robert C. Buchanan. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Sallie M. Buchanan, widow of the late Robert C. Buchanan, colonel and brevet major-general in the United States Army.

Mr. WITHERS. As chairman of the Pensions Committee I will call attention to the fact that we had that case before us and reported it adversely upon the ground that the applicant is already in receipt of the pension provided by law for the widow of an officer of that rank.

Mr. WHYTE. The Senator misapprehends the case.

Mr. WITHERS. I profess to know something of what I am speaking about. There was a considerable number of applications for increase of pensions beyond the rate fixed by law for widows of deceased Army and Navy officers. During the present session, according to my recollection, those increases have not been granted. The effect of granting the increase, in my judgment, would be to insure similar action in all similar cases, of which there are certainly a considerable number.

I will state that in view of the magnitude of the pension appropriation now and the prospect, the certainty I might say, of its increase, the committee have been more rigid during the present Congress than heretofore in the examination and adjudication of these cases, and in their recommendations to the Senate. They regard the amount of the pension fixed by law for this class of cases as being sufficient to insure at least a decent and reasonable support to the pensioner. Of course going beyond this amount there is no criterion by which we can attempt to estimate the extent to which increase the pensions may proceed.

We have deemed it also safest, in view of the same condition of things, to report adversely upon all cases proposing to apply the principle of arrears of pension to special cases, because, as the committee deem, these cases do not stand upon the same footing as those where the regular pension is clearly established before the proper tribunal, the Pension Bureau.

Those two principles have controlled the recommendations of the committee during this Congress. It is for the Senate, of course, to determine whether they will sustain the committee in its action or not.

I have nothing further to say with regard to the merits.

Mr. BECK. I hope we shall not take up any matter on which there has been an adverse report and which will bring on discussion. There are a number of small matters which perhaps we could take up which will not be discussed, but to take up a bill upon which there is an adverse report at this late hour it seems to me would involve us in a difficulty which we could not get clear of.

I want to say to the Senate that I have been unable to be on the floor since last Saturday during the consideration of private bills; I have been running in and out, and have been sent for continually. Therefore I have not been able to present a small matter which I think the Senate will unanimously agree to. The very moment I can get the hearing of the Senate I shall ask the Senate to allow me to have passed a joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to place upon the retired list Brigadier-General Thomas C. Crittenden. He is ordered to Dakota now, and it is utterly impossible in his state of health for him to go. He lost his only child in the Custer massacre; and to send him out there now within four or five months of the time when he ought to be retired is almost death to him. The joint resolution is reported unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs, has passed the House, and I hope the Senate will give me a chance to consider it.

Mr. GROOME. My honored friend, the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, is right in his first statement that in this case there has been an adverse report by the Committee on Pensions. That report, I can say with propriety, was the report of a divided committee, the majority, however, being against the pensioning of this lady. He is wrong, however, in all else that he has stated, evidently from the fact of the case being called up suddenly when he was not looking for it, and when he had not examined the report.

This lady has no pension whatever. It is not the case of an application for an increase of pension to a greater rate than that usually allowed widows of officers of the same rank which her husband held in the Army. On the contrary, her husband entered the Army as a lad; he remained in it for upward of forty years; he performed, as this report shows, most distinguished services during that whole period, rising from the position of second-lieutenant to that of major-general by brevet in the regular Army.

When he reached an age when he was no longer fit for active duty in the Army, at his own request, being a broken and infirm man, he was placed on the retired list, upon which he continued to remain for several years and until his death. When he died, as his death occurred from apoplexy, it was impossible to connect distinctly and clearly that disease with a physical condition existing at the time he was placed on the retired list, and brought about by acts in the line of his duty. A physician of distinction, it is true, gave a certificate in which he stated that General Buchanan's whole bodily organization having undergone organic changes during the years in which he had passed from his early manhood to old age, a predisposition to that disease had in all probability been implanted in his system before he left the Army to go upon the retired list, and was the result of services rendered in the line of duty; but, as will be seen, it is impossible where the person died of a disease of this kind distinctly to trace the death to a physical condition existing at the time he left the service.

Therefore the minority of the committee of the Senate, following the action of the committee of the House, did not base their desire to have a favorable report in this case upon the fact that he died of disease contracted in the service, but upon military services of the greatest distinction, in which he has not only done honor to himself as a brave and faithful officer, but in which he has reflected honor upon his country.

His widow now, as I am told by my colleague, and as I am also assured by others, a lady of seventy years of age, is in most moderate circumstances; and this small boon from a grateful country we feel that we can ask with great propriety, especially in view of the fact that at former sessions of Congress, if not at this, like pensions have been granted by special acts for distinguished services rendered by the husband of the lady asking for a pension.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will only detain the Senate a moment. I am very glad to second the remarks of my friend the Senator from Maryland, and I hope this pension will be granted. This officer was one of the heroes of three wars, the Florida war, the Mexican war, and the late war. I think this lady is a very deserving lady. I know her personally, and I know that she is in need of a pension. I am very glad to second all that the Senator from Maryland has said upon this subject, and will cast my vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to say that I was under a misapprehension as to the case, produced by a similarity of names. I was not in the Senate when the bill was called up or I should have objected to its consideration as it was an adverse report, and I do not wish to have the time of the Senate consumed on cases adversely reported. Coming into the Senate just as the bill was being read I confounded it, owing to the similarity of names, with the case of Mrs. Admiral Buchanan, whose case was before the committee some time ago. In this case, as I now recollect, no application for a pension has been made. I have not been able to get the report.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read at the desk.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. GROOME. The Senator is wrong altogether as to the facts.

Mr. WITHERS. So I say; and I ask for the reading of the report.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to inquire if the bill has been regularly taken up by order of the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been taken up by unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. It is then in an attitude such as that one objection will not carry it over?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. HARRIS. I desired to call for the regular order, as this is a bill that will take time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate and must be disposed of. The reading of the report will proceed.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the following report, submitted by Mr. WITHERS January 21, 1881:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the bills (H. R. No. 3292 and S. No. 7) granting a pension to Sally M. Buchanan, have examined the same, and report:

That they find the facts to be as stated in report No. 75, House of Representatives of Forty-sixth Congress:

"That the memorialist, in her petition filed in this case, substantially sets forth the military history of the said Robert C. Buchanan, and the same will be briefly mentioned in this report to show the grounds upon which the favorable action of this committee is based. That said Robert C. Buchanan entered the Army of the United States as brevet second lieutenant on the 1st day of July, 1830, being attached to the Fourth Infantry, ordered to Fort Crawford, Prairie du Chien, and served with it in and until the close of the 'Black Hawk war'; was in command of the gun-boats on the Wisconsin River on the night of the capture of Black Hawk; was present at the making of the treaty of General Scott with Keokuk, by which large portions of what is now Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota were ceded to the United States; that he accompanied his regiment, as its adjutant, to Florida, and in 1838 to Fort Cass, in Tennessee, to assist in removing the Cherokees to Fort Gibson, Arkansas, and in command of his company, as its captain, again served in Florida and until the close of the war; that in 1844 he was ordered to Louisiana, where his regiment, with the Third Infantry and the Second Dragoons, formed the 'army of observation;' that in July, 1845, he proceeded with his regiment to Corpus Christi, Texas, where they formed the 'army of occupation;' that he served with the troops under General Taylor until after the capture of the city of Monterey, when, at the request of the officers of the Maryland and District of Columbia volunteers, he was assigned to the command of those troops, and commanded them until they were discharged at Tampico, Mexico, in May, 1847; that he then rejoined his regiment, and was assigned its junior major, and served in that capacity until after the capture of the city of Mexico; that in January, 1848, he was appointed by General Scott acting assistant inspector-general to the army in Mexico, in which capacity he served until the regiment of voltigeurs was mustered out of the service in September, 1848.

"In the spring of 1856 he was assigned by General Wool to the command of the district of Southern Oregon and Northern California, to command the troops operating against the Indians in what is known as the 'Rogue River war,' and in the period of three months, with about three hundred and fifty men, succeeded in bringing the war to a final close, having beaten the Indians several times, and capturing about one thousand eight hundred prisoners, and removing them about two hundred miles north of the depot. He commanded a brigade of regular troops in the Army of the Potomac, under Generals McClellan and Burnside, until after the battle of Fredericksburgh; in 1863-'64 he was assigned to duty as assistant provost-marshal-general of the State of New Jersey until the fall of 1864, when he was ordered to New Orleans to command his regiment in the Department of the Gulf; in the following year he was placed on duty at Washington, under the immediate command of the then Secretary of War, E. M. Stanton; and in the latter part of 1867 was ordered to New Orleans to command the district of Louisiana, with his brevet rank of brigadier-general; and in March, 1868, succeeded General Hancock in the command of the fifth reconstruction district, with his brevet rank of major-general, until after the State of Louisiana was admitted into the Union; he then organized the Department of Louisiana, which he commanded, after the death of General Rousseau, until April, 1869, when he was ordered with his command to Fort Wayne; and on the 31st day of December, 1870, at his own request, after a service of more than forty years, he was placed upon the retired list, with the rank of colonel, brevet major-general."

The deceased died of apoplexy on the 29th day of November, 1878, nearly eight years after he was placed upon the retired list. It is therefore impossible to connect his death with disease contracted in the service in the line of duty. Your committee, while fully appreciating the fact of the honorable, distinguished, and long-continued services of General Robert C. Buchanan, do not feel that such services justify them in making the widow of General Buchanan an exception to the general rule, that widows of officers or enlisted men are not entitled to pensions where their husbands died of disease not contracted in the service in the line of duty. They therefore report adversely.

Mr. WITHERS. I do not desire to consume the time of the Senate or to prevent a vote upon this proposition; but the position which I occupy as chairman of the Committee on Pensions and the fact that they have adversely reported on this case after deliberation and consideration of its merits, requires that I shall say something, and I shall do so notwithstanding I seem to trench on the sensibilities of the Senator from Maryland.

I call attention to the fact that by the admission of the report itself there can be no relation established between the death of this officer and his military services. It is admitted in the report itself as I now find it that the connection cannot be established. The widow is therefore entitled to no pension under the provisions of any existing law.

With the distinct statement of this fact to the Senate, I leave it for the Senate to determine whether it will step outside of the law and grant a pension in this case.

Mr. WHYTE. I desire to say to the Senate that the Committee on Pensions of this body two years ago unanimously reported in favor of a similar bill, and the Senate unanimously passed it. It went to the House too late to be acted upon by the House. The House has since passed the bill upon the unanimous report of the committee there, and it came over to the Senate precisely as it was before. The Senate has already by its Committee on Pensions unanimously passed in favor of it, and in the body of the Senate it has been unanimously passed.

Mr. WITHERS. That statement requires an additional explanation, but it was given partly in my first remarks. I said that during this Congress we had restricted the granting of pensions beyond the degree which formerly ruled the committee, and we did it by reason of the fact of the immense increase of the pension list and the appropriation required; and that while heretofore we have granted pensions as gratuities we have not been disposed to do so during the present Congress. That is the whole explanation of it.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. WITHERS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Allison,	Cameron of Pa.,	Jones of Florida,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Coke,	Lamar,	Teller,
Bailey,	Garland,	Maxey,	Vance,
Blair,	Groome,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Brown,	Hill of Colorado,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Burnside,	Hill of Georgia,	Randolph,	Whyte.
Butler,	Hoar,	Ransom,
Call,	Jonas,	Rollins,

NAYS—16.

Beck,	Harris,	Kernan,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Hereford,	McPherson,	Vest,
Eaton,	Johnston,	Platt,	Wallace,
Ferry,	Jones of Nevada,	Pugh,	Withers.

ABSENT—29.

Baldwin,	Davis of W. Va.,	Kellogg,	Saulsbury,
Bayard,	Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Sharon,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Logan,	Thurman,
Booth,	Farley,	McDonald,	Williams,
Bruce,	Grover,	McMillan,	Windom.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	Morgan,
Conkling,	Hampton,	Paddock,
Davis of Illinois,	Ingalls,	Plumb,

So the bill was passed.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. LOGAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JAMES H. BLOUNT of Georgia, Mr. JOHN A. MCMAHON of Ohio, and Mr. JAMES MONROE of Ohio, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the Senate's amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. BECK, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. BECK Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, and Mr. WINDOM.

CHEROKEE AND ARKANSAS RIVER RAILROAD.

Mr. BECK and Mr. LAMAR addressed the Chair.

Mr. HARRIS. I demand the regular order.

Mr. LAMAR. The first bill on the Calendar in the regular order is the one which I now ask to take up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the special order for the consideration of House bills?

Mr. LAMAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair state the regular order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is the call of the Calendar of House bills under the special order, or Harris rule, so-called.

Mr. PADDOCK. Did not that order expire the other evening when the Calendar was gone through with under it?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It did not; it is a continuing order; has so been held by the Senate. The Secretary will report the House bills on the Calendar in their order.

The bill (H. R. No. 6061) to incorporate the Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company was announced as first in order upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk began to read the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to the further consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa objects to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I move to postpone the pending and all prior orders in order that I may move to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say to the Senator from Tennessee that there are only one or two unobjected bills left on the Calendar which come under the rule which he himself introduced the other day. One of them is a bill which relates to a person from his own section of the country, in which both the Senators from Texas are interested. I ask the Senator if he will not postpone the motion until we can deal with these other one or two unobjected cases. It will be equally in order for him to make the motion five or ten minutes hence; but if his bill is called up now and we have a debate of an hour or two over it, which is quite possible, it being for a railroad through the Indian Territory I understand, then those matters will be driven off. I do not ask this in the interest of anything that relates either to me or to any constituent of mine. The bill relates solely to a citizen of Texas, which both of the Senators from that State take an interest in, and which I suppose it will not take two minutes to pass.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to state in connection with what has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the bill for the relief of William Redus, referred to by him, was passed by the House unanimously, was unanimously reported by the Committee on Claims, and will not take more time than the reading of it will consume, it being only a dozen lines.

Mr. HARRIS. If the bill which is now reached on the Calendar can be taken up, I shall be glad if the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] who has it in charge will make a brief statement as to its importance. I am sure no bill can be of greater importance than this measure, and if it can be taken up I think the Senator from Mississippi will allow it to be informally laid aside.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator that that requires unanimous consent, and he therefore might find a difficulty; but if he can carry this motion now by a majority of the Senate, he certainly can carry it five minutes hence just as well. I do not think the unobjected cases on the Calendar will take five minutes.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee make his motion?

Mr. HARRIS. I have made the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate postpone the consideration of the pending order?

Mr. LAMAR. I should like to make one statement. I rarely occupy the attention of the Senate and I ask its indulgence.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. LAMAR. I have only one or two remarks to make. This bill has been very fully considered by the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate, and after that consideration both committees have cordially recommended its passage. The bill has been prepared with great care, looking minutely to the interest of the Indians through whose territory the proposed railroad is to pass. Every right of private property has been preserved.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Is there any provision in the bill for obtaining the consent of these Indians for the passing of this railroad through their territory?

Mr. LAMAR. I think the consent of the Indians has already been formally given to a railroad of this kind in treaties made with the Government. I would have no objection whatever to a provision in the bill to that effect; such a provision was inserted in the bill recommended by the Senate Committee; it is omitted in the House bill, and the only objection to an amendment of that sort at this time is that it would prevent the legislation which both committees have concurred without conflict in recommending. The House of Representatives has already passed the bill and without objection after discussion. It is simply an ordinary bill granting the right of way. It asks no aid from the Government of any kind, either of money or land or loan of credit. It reasserts the validity of the treaties made with the Indians, and subjects every franchise granted in the charter of incorporation to the operation of those treaties. It expressly provides that the tribal rights of the Indians and their rights of property shall be respected. Every safeguard is thrown around the rights of the Indians that is accorded by existing law, whether treaty or statute, in every respect.

I repeat, sir, that this is an important connection, and one which both of the representatives of Arkansas and the representatives of Kansas urged upon the committee as demanded by the commercial interests of both sections of the country lying on opposite sides of the Territory.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to ask the Senator whether the amendment I propose to offer will be objectionable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would remind Senators that the merits of the bill to be taken up cannot be discussed on this motion.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to debate it, but merely to ask whether the amendment I propose to offer will be objectionable. Let it be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to add to the bill:

Provided, That this act shall not go into effect until the tribes of Indians through whose territory this road may run shall, in a council of their respective tribes, called together under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, give their consent to this said act, and signify the same to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LAMAR. I should be perfectly willing, and so would the committee, that an amendment looking to the result which the Senator from Illinois contemplates in his amendment should be incorporated, but the addition of any amendment now would necessitate sending the bill back to the House, and the legislation would be lost.

There is one other objection which has been suggested to the verbiage of the amendment. It makes the validity of the legislation of Congress dependent upon the assent of these Indian tribes by their respective councils. I think a different mode of expression, providing for their assent to the right of way, would be better; but any amendment now adopted would be fatal to the final passage of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate, nor do I wish to antagonize the measure, and I very much dislike to do what I even now do, seeing the earnestness of the Senator from Mississippi in reference to this matter; but I wish to say to him that I myself, speaking only for myself, cannot agree to this bill passing without this or a similar amendment. I only say that by way of notice I do not think the bill can be passed without an amendment of this kind, however much I dislike to interpose any obstruction.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to say one word. I objected to the consideration of this bill, and did so because I have been personally called upon by the representatives of these Indian tribes objecting to this legislation unless an amendment something like the one proposed by the Senator from Illinois shall be adopted. I have no sort of objection to the consideration of the bill if the rights of the Indians, whatever they are, can be protected in it.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair again desires to remind the Senate that the merits of this bill are not to be discussed on this motion.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to make an inquiry of my colleague on the committee, for I was not present in committee when this bill was considered. The Senate bill was referred to a sub-committee of which I was a member, and that bill, as the Senator has just stated, required the consent of the tribes. If it be not out of order, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Mississippi whether he understands, if this bill becomes a law, the railroad can be constructed through the Indian Territory without the tribe's consent or not?

Mr. LAMAR. I think that the bill does not provide for their consent, but it asserts their rights under the treaties, and those treaties have already expressly consented in my opinion and in the opinion of the committee of the House. The Indians have already in treaties made by the Government consented to the construction of railroads of this kind through the Territory.

Mr. DAWES. No doubt they consented to two roads, one north and south and one east and west across their Territory. It was the understanding of that sub-committee that that right had been exhausted. I may be mistaken about it, but the Senate bill was very particular in preserving those rights; and now I understand the Senator to object to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Illinois on the ground that it makes the legislation of Congress dependent upon the consent of the tribes. If the Senator from Mississippi means by that that he proposes by paramount legislation here to put a railroad across the Territory whether the Indians consent or not, I cannot support such a bill.

Mr. LAMAR. The legislation proposes that the road shall be constructed in accordance with the stipulations of the treaties. The Senator from Massachusetts, I think, is under an error in the impression which he has already stated, that the scheme of the treaties with the Indians looked to the construction of only two roads through the Territory, one running north and south and the other east and west, and if he will listen to me for a moment I think I can convince him of his error.

These treaties were made with different tribes and at different times, and they contain very varying and in some respects contrarient stipulations, some larger and some smaller. Each tribe consents in the treaty with the Government that through its reservation a line of railroad shall be run north and one east; a line beginning on the northern boundary, penetrating the Territory and going through the southern boundary, and another line going from east to west or vice versa. These treaties were not made with all the Indians together, but with the various tribes separately, and that these trunk lines should pass through each reservation.

If it were true that only two trunk lines were contemplated, the scheme would be an utterly impracticable one, inasmuch as the geographical relationship of these different tribes to each other would make such a system of railroads utterly impossible. For instance, if you were to run a road north and south through the Cherokee Nation, it would not touch the Osages; it would not touch the Seminoles; it would not touch the Chickasaws; it would not touch the Kansas territory. The Government made treaties with all these Indians. If you were to run a line east and west through any one of them, it would not touch three-fourths of the other territory. Therefore if there is anything in the point, the Government has reserved the right to run twelve roads through that country instead of two. An examination of the map will convince any gentleman that such was not the scheme of those treaties; and this view is borne out by the fact that simultaneously with the negotiation of those treaties the Congress of the United States enacted laws in 1866 incorporating four different railroads authorizing them to run their line through the territory.

Mr. PADDOCK. I dislike very much to interrupt the Senator; but in the interest of economy of time I desire to interpose the objection that this debate on the merits of the question is out of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has twice reminded Senators that the merits of the bill are not in order to be discussed on this motion.

Mr. PADDOCK. We have but a few hours of the session left, and the discussion of the merits will have to be made over again when the bill is taken up. I dislike to interrupt the Senator from Mississippi with such an objection; but if we take up the bill undoubtedly the same argument on the merits of the question will have to be had over again. It seems to me in the interest of economy of time it would be better to settle whether the bill is to be taken up and then discuss it.

Mr. LAMAR. I think the point is well taken.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President——

Mr. LAMAR. I should like to read just one quotation from the bill:

Provided, That it does not conflict with existing treaties.

Another is:

Provided, That property rights belonging to Indians in their tribal relations shall be included among the property rights protected by this section.

Now, Mr. President, all I ask is that the Senate will consider and either pass or vote down the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I desired only, when I rose, to give notice of an amendment similar to that suggested by the Senator from Illinois. I have examined the treaties with these various Indian tribes, and I differ entirely with the honorable chairman of the Committee on Railroads in his construction of them. I shall be prepared, if the bill is taken up, to present to the Senate the opinion of the proper Department of the Government having charge of Indian affairs on that subject; and I trust when the bill is taken up, if it shall be, the Senate will be prepared to take no action which will jeopard in any degree the rights of these Indians as guaranteed by treaties with the United States.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to a single suggestion. He fears that if this bill shall be amended and have to go back to the House it cannot be passed. I understand it to be the invariable rule when Congress passes a bill in substance like this, to reserve power to alter, amend, or repeal such a bill. I understand that to be universally the case.

Mr. COCKRELL. Always.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. And as there is no such provision in this bill I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi whether it is not very probable that if the Senate shall adhere to the rule adopted in such cases the bill will have to be amended in that particular.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to say to the Senator from Iowa that I have an amendment prepared upon that point.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I noticed that it is not in the bill now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to postpone the pending order.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 25, noes 15.

Mr. MCMILLAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It seems to me that to set aside the pending order to take up a bill of this character is a very unusual thing at this stage of the session. If this bill is to be taken up it will lead to a very lengthy discussion. Upon the face of this bill it presents to me a very objectionable scheme, and I trust the Senate will before voting upon this question consider well what they are about to do—the incorporation of a great railroad company here and granting to it privileges to pass through territory which we have already set apart to the Indians and have secured to them under all the pledges the nation could give.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 36, nays 22; as follows:

So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6061) to incorporate the Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. GARLAND. Under ordinary circumstances, Mr. President, I would favor the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] as to the amendment to be incorporated in this bill; that is, to subject this bill to the approval or to the acceptance of the different nations that are interested in it, and also to put in the power to repeal, modify, &c., as suggested by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.] But inasmuch as it is now certain that any amendment will be fatal to this bill, I wish to say a few words to the Senate why it should be accepted and passed as it is.

In the fourth section of the bill it is required that they shall be incorporated and act under the act of March 3, 1875, the fifth section of which act reads as follows:

That this act shall not apply to any lands within the limits of any military park or Indian reservation, or other lands specially reserved from sale, unless such right of way shall be provided for by treaty stipulation or by act of Congress heretofore passed.

This was a kind of general right of way act passed March 3, 1875. The fourth section of this act, if it becomes a law, places the right of way under the act of March 3, 1875, and if the company does not comply with that act this act amounts to nothing. The rights to be guarded and protected under the amendment signified by the Senator from Illinois are reserved in the act of March 3, 1875, the fifth section of which I have read.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. What is the section?

Mr. GARLAND. Section 5 of the act of March 3, 1875, is imported by enactment into the fourth section of this act.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. But, if I understand this bill, only sections 1 and 4 of that act are made applicable.

Mr. GARLAND. That is the right granted by these previous sections. Now it says this act shall not apply, and that means the whole of this act, sections 1, 2, 3, and 4, and all the rest shall not apply to any of these particular pieces of land, unless there are treaty stipulations or acts of Congress heretofore passed making the grant. But now Senators will bear in mind that in lines 11 and 12 of section 5 of this bill we have this proviso:

Provided, That it does not conflict with existing treaties.

The treaties are cared for in all their parts and all their operations throughout the entire body of this act. So this corporation when it becomes a corporation proceeds at its own peril, takes steps at its own risk under this act; and if it has not complied with the act of Congress of March 3, 1875, and with the treaty stipulations existing, it takes nothing by this act, and it becomes a mere piece of waste paper. But, if Senators please, that is not all. In line 29 of section 5 the bill says further:

Provided, That property rights belonging to Indians in their tribal relations shall be included among the property rights protected by this section.

Now, I say it is utterly impossible to throw any more restrictions around these people than are thrown by this act in connection with the act of March 3, 1875, which pro tanto is incorporated in this proposed act and re-enacted.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Arkansas a question?

Mr. GARLAND. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Arkansas whether there is any security in this bill that any sum whatever will ever be paid in in full in cash, or that any subscription beyond the sum of $600,000 will ever be made in good faith for such payment, and whether he deems it a wise policy in view of our past experience to incorporate railroads without that safeguard? I should like to ask further, as I see the bill refers to the famous Pacific Railroad act of 1864, whether in his judgment that contains quite all the securities for the public interest that it should have contained?

Mr. GARLAND. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I do not think it does. If I had had any connection with the drafting or passing of that law, I should have attempted at least to put in more than is contained in that bill. But that bill is now the law of the land, and it is operative and we are acting under it, and this bill pretends to follow just that law in its length and breadth, and, if you please, in its depth, so far and no farther. We may have our different opinions as to the meaning of the treaties. I might believe that they meant one thing and my friend from Massachusetts might believe they meant another. It is impossible to incorporate these different interpretations in an act. It is sufficient, however, to say that unless these treaty stipulations are complied with this act goes for naught. That is as far as any law could go; and in view of the importance of this matter and in view of the high respectability and character of the gentlemen connected with this corporation, I think a sufficient guarantee is given to these people under the act attempted to be passed, and I hope the Senate will proceed to pass it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. How far will this road run in the State of Arkansas if this charter shall be granted?

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Mississippi who has charge of the bill says ninety miles. I have not calculated it exactly.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, this bill has been discussed hitherto with reference to the question as to whether it preserves the treaty rights of the Indian tribes. It seems to me that attention ought to be called to some of the remarkable features of this bill apparent upon the face of it. The history of railroad corporations chartered by Congress admonishes us that on the last day of the session a bill of such character ought not to be passed without careful scrutiny.

Now, here is a railroad corporation proposed with a capital of $4,300,000——

Mr. HOAR. Not exceeding that.

Mr. PLATT. Not exceeding $4,300,000.

Mr. HOAR. It may be a capital of $100,000.

Mr. PLATT. It is provided that it may organize when $100,000 shall be subscribed in good faith. There is no provision that any more stock shall ever be subscribed; there is no provision in it that a dollar shall ever be paid upon any share of stock subscribed; but when $100,000 have been subscribed it may organize; it may file its certificate of acceptance with the Secretary of the Interior, and having done that, it is authorized and empowered to construct its railroad and telegraph line through any Indian land or reservation whatever. I think we ought to be very cautious about the chartering of any more railroad corporations without some security that something shall be paid before the railroad is built.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I must ask that this bill be informally laid aside in order that I may call up the deficiency bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to its being informally laid aside.

Mr. WALLACE. Then I move to lay it aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to postpone the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WALLACE. I now move to take up the deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. I move that the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations be acted upon as they are reached in reading and before any further amendments be received.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be observed, the Chair hearing no objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "State Department," after line 31, to insert:

To pay John Jay, late envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Austria, for amount expended by him for telegrams on public business, $220.46.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 35, to insert:

For compensation and expenses of the commissioners appointed to act with the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to China to negotiate and conclude by treaty a settlement of matters of interest to the two governments, and such as may be confided to them, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Treasury Department," in line 75, after "1881," to strike out "five hundred" and insert "seven hundred and forty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Internal revenue:

For additional amount to pay salaries and expenses of agents and surveyors, and fees and expenses of gaugers, and for salaries of storekeepers, and for miscellaneous expenses of internal revenue for the year 1881, $745,000; and for the year 1880, $135,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 84, to increase the appropriation

"for additional amount for dies, paper, and stamps for the use of the internal revenue for the year 1881," from $75,000 to $130,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to line 129.

Mr. LOGAN. At that point in the bill I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. I trust the Senator will withdraw his amendment until the amendments of the committee have been acted upon. That was the understanding when we began the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to that provided I can go back and offer my amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. There will be no trouble on that account.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment was, in line 135, to reduce the appropriation "for constructing elevator in the court-house and post-office building at Indianapolis, Indiana," from $10,000 to $5,000.

Mr. VOORHEES. I should like to ask the committee why that change is made in the appropriation allowed by the House?

Mr. WALLACE. Simply because the committee believed that $5,000 was enough to construct any elevator.

Mr. VOORHEES. I should like to know on what ground $10,000 is estimated for the building, and if the committee has information that the elevator can be built for $5,000 I should be glad of it. But if it is a mere opinion, I shall have to take issue, because it has been estimated to cost $10,000.

Mr. WALLACE. We had no information before us on the subject.

Mr. VOORHEES. I give notice that I shall ask at the proper time to disagree with the amendment offered by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The question now is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BECK. Having no information, we reduced the amount to $5,000, so that when we come together with the House conferees, if they show that $10,000 is estimated as the proper amount that can be agreed to at once. This is to leave it open. That is all.

Mr. VOORHEES. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McDONALD subsequently said: I desire to go back for a moment by leave of the committee to line 135, where $10,000 was stricken out and $5,000 inserted "for constructing an elevator in the court-house and post-office building at Indianapolis, Indiana."

I believe the committee struck that down from a misapprehension of the facts. The construction of an elevator in the court-house at Indianapolis requires some considerable changes of the internal arrangement, taking down stairways, taking out partitions and making, a change in some of the rooms in order to accommodate the elevator. The estimate was made by the architect. Here is a bill introduced making this appropriation which received the sanction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, passed the Senate, went to the House, and would have passed there, but for the fact that they have never reached Senate bills. The House committee, however, took it up and put it into the appropriations in this bill. In that form it has passed and come here. It was under a misapprehension of the facts that it was stricken down to $5,000. It is simply to carry out a bill the Senate had already passed on the recommendation of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the Senator know that this amount of money is necessary for the purpose?

Mr. McDONALD. I know it is thought so by the architect, and was so placed in the bill that the Senate passed. I therefore ask unanimous consent to restore this appropriation as the House made it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again on the amendment of the committee in line 135. If that is disagreed to the amount fixed by the House, $10,000, will stand.

The amendment was rejected.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 139, after "1880," to strike out "$329.10" and insert "$658.21;" so as to make the clause read:

To pay B. F. Scribner, late special agent at the seal-fisheries in Alaska, salary and traveling expenses for 1880, $658.21.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 143, after "1880" to strike out "$277.10" and insert "$554.20;" so as to read:

And to pay J. W. Beaman, late a special agent at the seal-fisheries in Alaska, salary and traveling expenses for 1880, $554.20.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 145, to insert:

To pay two assistant agents at the seal-fisheries in Alaska, at the rate of $2,190 each per annum, $1,095; and for necessary traveling expenses, at the rate of $600 each per annum, $300; in all, $1,395.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I should like to ask some explanation of that.

Mr. BECK. I can answer that, perhaps. In the sundry civil bill we provided for them for next year, but as that bill does not take effect until the 1st of July, this deficiency is to provide for the interval between now and the 1st of July. There are two assistants to be appointed, two men who are obliged to be there.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. In the sundry civil bill the question of legislation on the appropriation bills was raised. I wanted to know whether this brings in for the first time these officers or whether they now exist by law?

Mr. BECK. Yes; they have existed for years and years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out the following clause, from line 152 to line 157:

To pay the judgment of the United States circuit court for the southern district of New York in favor of Edward S. Sherman, plaintiff, and against Moses H. Grinnell, former collector of customs of the port of New York, defendant, including damages, $1,130.79.

Mr. HOAR. Why should that be stricken out?

Mr. WALLACE. Because we had no information whatever, and it was not found in the Book of Estimates of deficiencies.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say that I know all about it. The Senate ought to know that the gentleman interested is a cousin of mine, and may make any deduction from my statement on that account that they choose. He recovered for some duties wrongfully paid this amount of money eight or ten years ago in a suit against the collector of New York in the circuit court, where the legal question between them in the regular order was settled; and it has stood ever since.

This has been estimated for once or twice by the Department, but by accident did not get included in the bill. I called at his request, last year I think it was, on the Department, and asked if it had been estimated, and they said no, but they would send in the estimate at once; that it ought to be paid. Thereupon it turned out that they were a little too late with their communication, and the bill got through without its being put in last year. It is an honest judgment before the circuit court of the United States in New York for a little overpayment of duties, where there was a fair and legal question which the party raised and had settled in the ordinary way. He is a respectable New York merchant.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator from Massachusetts gives us information that we had not before. The amendment can be voted down.

The amendment was rejected.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "War Department," in the appropriations for "arrears of pay and bounty," after the word "appropriated," in line 275, to strike out "out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" and in line 280, after the word "heirs," to insert "not exceeding $300,000;" so as to make the clause read:

For the payment of claims for pay and bounty due to officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces, and their heirs and legal representatives, there shall be, and hereby is, appropriated so much as may be necessary to pay said claims, allowed during this and prior fiscal years, under the following heads of appropriations, as follows: "Pay of two and three year volunteers," and "Bounty to volunteers and their widows and legal heirs," not exceeding $300,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress at the commencement of the next regular session the amount that has been paid out under this provision during the fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 316, to insert:

For the purchase and manufacture of clothing, camp and garrison equipage, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Navy Department," after line 341, to insert:

For the Bureau of Construction and Repair and the Bureau of Steam Engineering, Navy Department, $375,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 363, to insert:

For forage for the Marine Corps for the fiscal year 1881, $1,352.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Interior Department," after line 385, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay Richard Joseph, disburing clerk, the sum of $1,000, for his services in connection with the disbursement of the census fund, payable from the appropriations for the tenth census heretofore made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to the end of line 443.

Mr. WALLACE. By direction of the committee I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 443, as a new paragraph:

Salaries and commissions of registers and receivers:

For salaries and commissions of registers of land offices and receivers of public moneys, being a deficiency for the current fiscal year, $55,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for the "Indian Office," in line 459, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "two thousand" and insert "four thousand two hundred and sixty;" so as to make the clause read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be sold an amount of the stocks or securities now held by the Government in trust for the Shawnee Indians, which, together with the accumulated interest thereon, will aggregate a sum not exceeding $4,260, sufficient to reimburse Daniel S. McDougal, or his legal heirs, and Charles S. Wilder, for the money by them paid for certain tracts of land belonging to said Shawnee Indians erroneously conveyed to them, and to which tracts of land the Government has given and can give no valid title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, before the word "thousand," in line 479, to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty;" so as to make the clause read:

Support of Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Apaches, Kiowas, Comanches, and Wichitas, 1881: This amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the support and civilization of the Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Apaches, Kiowas, Comanches, and Wichitas for the balance of the fiscal year, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1881, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 486, to insert:

For the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Interior to indemnify the Ponca tribe of Indians for losses sustained by them in consequence of their removal to the Indian Territory, to secure to them lands in severalty on either the old or new reservations, in accordance with their wishes, and to settle all matters of difference with these Indians, $165,000; to be immediately available, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, as follows:

For the purchase of 101,894 acres of land in the Indian Territory, where most of these Indians are now located, $50,000.

To be distributed per capita among the Ponca Indians in the Indian Territory, $10,000.

For the purchase of stock cattle and draught animals for Poncas in the Indian Territory, $10,000.

For the erection of dwelling-houses for Poncas now in Dakota, $5,000; for agricultural implements, stock, and seed, $5,000; for school purposes, $5,000; for general distribution among them per capita, $10,000.

To be held as a permanent fund in the Treasury of the United States, at 5 per cent. interest, the interest to be distributed annually among all the Ponca Indians, in cash, $70,000.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator who has the bill in charge. What is the meaning of the appropriation of $70,000 in lines 509 to 512?

Mr. WALLACE. If the Senator from Colorado will take the whole of that together, he will see that it is for the Poncas. Line 487, on page 21, authorizes the appropriation of $165,000, of which that $70,000 is part. It came to us strongly indorsed and recommended, and the committee put it in the bill.

Mr. TELLER. All I want to find out is whether this is supposed to be a settlement of the Ponca matter or not?

Mr. WALLACE. That is the interpretation the committee placed on it.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me a remarkable way to settle a controversy of that kind in the deficiency bill, and I think substantially without the consent or concurrence of these Indians. But I am not specially charged with the Ponca business; my friend from Massachusetts and some other Senators here are interested in it; and I think it needs some little attention before we incorporate this provision in the statute.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the inquiry of the Senator?

Mr. TELLER. I am inquiring what is the purpose of the amendment on pages 21 and 22 with reference to the Ponca Indians? I want to know whether the Ponca Indians are a party to this, or whether we are settling this according to our notions.

Mr. ALLISON. We are not settling anything, as the Senator will see by examining the amendment. We are making some little headway toward providing for the support of the Ponca Indians, in accordance with the agreement made on the subject. I trust the Senator from Colorado will not make any objection to this provision for the Poncas.

Mr. TELLER. I am willing to agree to any effort this committee will make to right the wrongs of the Ponca Indians. I believe I may say I was the first Senator who on this floor called the attention of the Senate to the outrages which had been perpetrated against this tribe of Indians by the Government of the United States, and I have taken some little interest and felt some sympathy in every move that has since been made to put that matter right.

I understand that now there is a very grave question before the public whether these Indians have ever accepted any settlement and whether they are prepared to accept any settlement save that of being put back upon the land which belongs to them as rightfully as any land which I own by virtue of a Government patent belongs to me; but I am not quite willing that a committee shall come here, whether it be by direction of the Interior Department or any other Department, and put upon an appropriation bill, the deficiency bill, a provision that shall in the future be declared to conclude these Indians and prevent them from asserting that which is their legal right.

I do not see any reason why it should have been in this bill, why it should not have come here in the Indian bill which is the appropriate and proper bill to make provision for all this character of claims; and it looks to me, with all deference to the committee, as if it appeared that this was one of the bills where it would be a great deal easier to settle a disputed controversy of this kind than it would on some other bill. I do not desire to object to it provided it shall not conclude these Indians and prevent them from asserting their rights in any way that they see fit and that it shall not be held as an estoppel to these Indians or their friends when they shall attempt to redress their wrongs.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I think if the Senator from Colorado will examine the first paragraph of the amendment he will see that it is the purpose and aim of the committee to enable the Secretary of the Interior to indemnify the Ponca tribe for losses sustained by them and to secure them either in their new or old reservation a settlement in accordance with their wishes. I do not see how it can be arranged in any better way for the Poncas than the committee propose.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask my friend from Iowa if he means by the phrase, "in accordance with their wishes," that the Indians are to be at liberty hereafter, the individual Indians, to express their wishes on that subject? Suppose there be a Ponca Indian removed from his old reservation (which removal everybody agrees was an outrage and a crime) who wants to go back, will he be entitled to go back to the old reservation under this, to have his homestead secured to him there under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior; or does it mean to claim that the Poncas were removed in accordance with their wishes?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not see that it provides anything about their removal.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator if he objects to this phrase after the word "wishes," in line 492, "as the members of said tribe shall hereafter prefer?" That excludes any inference that they have already bound themselves, or that they have been forced to any conclusion whatever. Accept that amendment and we can go on.

Mr. ALLISON. I cannot accept that; I do not know about that.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I have but a very few words to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts repeat his amendment?

Mr. DAWES. In line 492, after the word "wishes," I move to insert "as the members of said tribe shall hereafter prefer."

Mr. HOAR. I think that will be accepted probably by the committee, from what I learn.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If they do accept it, it should be stated whether the consent is to be by the whole tribe, or by the headmen of the tribe.

Mr. DAWES. It is proposed to allot them lands in severalty, and that each member of the tribe take his allotment either in the Indian Territory or in the old reservation.

Mr. PADDOCK. Say "in open council."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I have been endeavoring for the last twelve months in my way and according to my best judgment to do something for these Ponca Indians. I have differed in opinion with others who are friendly to them, as I am, as to the best mode in which that can be done. My own judgment is clear; I have no doubt whatever that the best thing that can be done for the Ponca Indians is to recognize the exact state of affairs as it exists to-day.

A portion of the tribe, something over one hundred in all, have left the reservation in the Indian Territory and gone to their old reservation in Dakota. No one proposes to disturb them there, but to make provision for them there. Something over five hundred of them remain in the Indian Territory upon the lands proposed to be bought by this bill for them.

But it is said they ought to be allowed, if they desire so to do, to leave the Indian Territory and go to Dakota. Well, Mr. President, I suppose that an Indian knows and has the right to know his own mind as well as a white man. After these Indians were taken to the Indian Territory, some two or three years ago, they were very much dissatisfied with their removal and continued so to be, as was to have been expected, considering the circumstances under which they were removed; but last year, the homesickness under which they had been laboring having passed away, they having become to a large extent acclimated to the new region in which they were living, they met in council on their own reservation and sent a written request to the Secretary of the Interior asking his permission to send their chiefs here to settle up with the Government their claim for damages because of the removal. That movement, if we can believe human testimony, originated with the Indians themselves; it was carried on by the Indians themselves. When in the month of October their letter requesting permission to send their chiefs here for the purpose of settlement reached the Secretary he assented to it, and the chiefs of the tribe came here from their agency in the Indian Territory, and spent a week, ten days, perhaps two weeks—I do not know how long—here in consultation upon this subject. They were examined in public as to what their wishes were, and what were the wishes of those they represented. They were examined in the presence of the special committee appointed to investigate this matter. They were examined in the presence of the commission appointed by the President of the United States to go to the Territory and see whether or not their chiefs here were truly representing them, and they gave throughout the whole the same and no uncertain sound in that regard.

Still, to satisfy some men who thought they knew more about this matter than the Indians themselves knew about it, a commission consisting of two distinguished Army officers and two civilians, after all this had been done, were sent to the Territory. When they arrived there they called the tribe together in consultation, and more than half of them met in council. So careful were these commissioners to exclude any undue influence from the council that they acted upon the somewhat extraordinary plan of excluding from the council while it was in session every white civil employé of the Government except themselves. The agent, the clerks, and all the employés of the agency were not permitted to be present while the Indians and these commissioners were in council. It was debated among them whether a police force consisting of Indians themselves should not be excluded as well from the council; and I suggested to one of the commissioners in examining him as a witness not long since whether they had not consulted upon the question of excluding themselves from the council because they were employés of the Government.

These Indian chiefs, and those who were not chiefs, being in council under these extraordinary circumstances, they reiterated what the tribe had agreed upon in October last, what the chiefs who were sent here in accordance with the council held in October said, and what they swore to here. These commissioners also report, and we have their testimony here before the Senate, that every Indian there desired to stand by what the council had agreed upon in October last, and what their chiefs for them had agreed upon with the Secretary of the Interior here during the present winter.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to ask him what General Miles's testimony is upon the point of the Indians having agreed to this arrangement?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. As I understand the testimony of General Miles, he testified that the Indians all said just what I am saying, but he had an opinion back of what they said, that he knew better than they did what they meant. His testimony is, that although the Indians say they want to stay there, that although they said that in October, that although they said that in the winter here and said it under oath, and although they said it in the council at which General Miles himself was present—notwithstanding all that, in his judgment they had been in some way influenced to that conclusion, and that they really did not in October or did not when here, or did not at the council, of which he was a member, express their true opinion.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand it, the question is not whether these Indians gave a formal assent, and not whether their seniors advised the tribe that it was best for them to assent; the question is whether they gave that assent because they despaired of justice from the United States, and because they said to themselves, "This Government never will let us go home, and it is better for our young men, who will never be permitted to go, to understand it at once, and to have it settled at once." That is the point concerning which some members of this body and some people elsewhere desire to be instructed. I wish to ask the honorable Senator if the Chief of that tribe, White Eagle, being inquired of before his committee by the Secretary of the Interior why he consented to remain in the Indian Territory after their struggles to get back to Dakota, did not reply, "It was in order that I might sit on a stone and look you in the face hereafter?" Does not General Miles say in substance that, although these Indians consented through their chiefs and in their councils, it was a consent given because they despaired of being permitted to return to the home which was as lawfully theirs under the treatics as the home of the wife and children of any member of this body is lawfully theirs, and they were removed to the Indian Territory by the bayonets of the United States in spite of its law?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I gave way to the Senator from Massachusetts for a question. He is forgetting, and instead of asking me a question he is making a speech.

Mr. HOAR. After I had finished my question my friend took his seat, and I supposed he desired I should go on. If he does not I will withdraw and proceed hereafter; but I wanted to call his attention to the point of what that consent means.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The point as presented is a very broad one; so broad that it would require some whittling I think to bring it to a point.

I was about saying that General Miles has an impression, doubtless honestly entertained, just such as the Senator from Massachusetts appears to have, and just such as some others appear to have, and what is that? It is that the Interior Department of the Government has been making and is making to-day a false pretense to the country in this regard; that it has been seeking by means of one kind and another to produce the impression upon the Senate and the country that this action of the Indians there is the true expression of their wishes, while such is not the fact. I cannot for my life understand what seems to be a desire and to yield a pleasure to some portion of our people to impute to others wrong motives and dishonorable actions. I am no apologist for Secretary Schurz; I have been no defender of his; we have differed widely in many regards; but justice and right ought to be done to him as well as to every other man, I apprehend.

I have before me the testimony taken by the commission which was sent down there after the proper Department of the Government had acted in this matter, and, as I presume, had acted conscientiously and rightly. It was a commission sent by the President upon outside pressure—outside of the ordinary mode of proceeding—to investigate substantially the question whether the Secretary of the Interior had been acting like an honest man or a scoundrel. Here is what those Indians there and then said. Mr. Allen, one of the civilians upon this commission, in interrogating White Eagle, puts this question to him:

Mr. ALLEN. If the Great Father wanted to send you back there and give you all you had before, would you want to go or stay?

WHITE EAGLE. If the Great Father should make that for me, I should think he'd have me wandering around; and for that reason, I should be unwilling to go and should want to remain here.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Great Father should give him as strong a paper for that land as he said he wanted for this land, would he be willing to go back there and remain permanently?

WHITE EAGLE. I would remain here. The matter is finished, and so I'll sit here.

So you will find all through this testimony that these men, knowing all the circumstances much better than either the Senator from Massachusetts or myself can know, having looked over the whole matter from top to bottom again and again, have reiterated their determination, reiterated their desire to remain where they are.

Mr. HOAR. Then will my friend inform me why he objects to a clause in the bill that they may take their choice in twelve months?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Just because I profess to be a friend to the Ponca Indians, and want to have this matter settled sometime. I do not want to fritter away another year when they should be at work upon their farms improving their condition; and in the mean time have emissaries sent through that country stirring up strife and contention.

Mr. HOAR. Will my friend tell me, if every one of them wants to stay, how it is going to disturb him to know that twelve months are given in which they can go if they choose; how it unsettles anything?

Mr. DAWES. Simply hereafter to express a wish.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That may be done in a year, or two years, or five years, or twenty years.

Mr. HOAR. No, one year is enough.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If the Senator from Massachusetts says to me that he wants to do a thing, he understands what he wants to do and has told me, and if he has told me once, twice, thrice what his desires and wishes are, it is an insult to ask him again if he wants to do it.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator if the commission on which Generals Miles and Crook sat did not recognize that the individual Indian should have a reasonable time, and if the President does not confirm that recommendation?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Oh, yes, they do that thing, but their judgment is not binding upon our judgment. We are here not to decide upon our action by the opinions of other men, but by the evidence given to us or to them.

Mr. HOAR. But when I put the question to my honorable friend, he implied—I will not say with a sneer or taunt, for that is not at all in accordance with his usually kindly and polite nature——

Mr. KIRKWOOD. No.

Mr. HOAR. But he implied that people who know a good deal more about it than the Senator from Massachusetts said so and so. I want to know if the commission and the President of the United States are included, in his judgment, in that list.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I said that these Indians knew a good deal more than the Senator from Massachusetts or myself, and I said they ought to know. I did not speak of others outside of the Indians as knowing more about their own condition than they themselves did.

It seems to me that this matter is reasonably familiar to the members of the Senate. I am content with the provision reported by the Committee on Appropriations, and I hope it will not be disturbed for the very controlling reason that I do not want another year to pass by during which these poor people shall be left in uncertainty.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the Secretary state the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PENDLETON in the chair.) The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 492 after the word "wishes" the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] moves to insert "as the members of said tribe shall hereafter prefer."

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, for about a year and a half I have been a member of the committee, a part of whose duties it has been to obtain information about the Ponca Indians. It is a long stay, and there is a good deal to be said about it on both sides; but necessarily there must at some time be a finality reached. There is an element of fairness upon the face of the proposition contained in the amendment to the amendment, but I submit to the Senate that if this matter is to be left open for the next twelve months, at the end of that time we shall be as far from the settlement of it as we are to-day.

Mr. HOAR. For six months.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Massachusetts says it is for six months. It is, I think, to the interest of these Indians that this matter be settled now. I think the Indians have expressed, in a manner which is as authentic as they usually express their wishes, a desire to remain where they are now respectively; that is to say, a portion of them in Dakota and the remainder of them in the Indian Territory. I think myself it would be better for the Indians if the Government were to say that those who are in Dakota shall go to the Indian Territory or those who are in the Indian Territory shall go back to Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of half past one o'clock having arrived, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 2022) in relation to the Japanese indemnity fund.

Mr. WALLACE. I trust that bill will be laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that the bill be laid aside in order to continue the consideration of the pending bill.

Mr. EATON. Without prejudice to the Japanese-fund bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without prejudice. The Chair hears no objection. The deficiency bill continues under consideration.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] allow me to call attention to the fact that time is rapidly passing? When he ceases I shall ask to apply the five-minute rule to speeches on this bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall detain the Senate but a moment longer. I think, in view of all that has taken place, the best thing that can be done is to recognize the existing status. If there are any Indians in the Indian Territory to-day belonging to the Ponca tribe, they are there because they choose to stay there; if there are Indians of the Ponca tribe in Dakota to-day, it is because they choose to be there. Why should we unsettle that which they themselves have settled by their own deliberate act? If this thing is laid over for six months, interested parties will be pursuing these people, interviewing them, stirring them up, and endeavoring to impress upon them, not the idea which the Indians themselves ought to entertain, but the idea which they entertain with regard to where their habitation should be, and at the end of six months this whole thing will not only be as bad as it is now, but a great deal worse.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, it does seem to me to be very unfortunate that a question involving so much as this question does should be sprung upon the Senate in the very last hours of the session. A committee, as was said, has been eighteen months at work diligently endeavoring to find the best method of solving this question. Against the report of that committee, against the message of the President of the United States, and against the report of a commission headed by those two gallant officers, Generals Crook and Miles, it is proposed in the last hours of this session to settle this thing here without any voice, in the consequences to this tribe of Indians in all time to come, to be expressed by themselves. It is a cruel act.

Here are five hundred Indians in the Indian Territory who day and night for three long years have importuned Congress and the President of the United States to permit them to go back to Dakota. Within the last six months they have upon paper and before committees, and in every way that they have expressed themselves, signified their willingness to stay there. There is no difference of opinion about the fact that they formally say they are willing to stay there, but the President having some doubt whether notwithstanding they have said so by a sudden change of this character, to satisfy himself and the country about what was the duty of the Government to them, sent a commission of four men, General Crook at the head, who understands the Indian character as well as any other man; the gallant General Miles, who has no peer as an Indian warrior or as a man; Mr. Stickney, of the Indian commission, who has labored ten years among the Indians trying to secure justice to them, and a distinguished individual from my own State whose integrity is above question. They went down there; they examined these Indians. They come back here and tell you plainly what the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Iowa insist upon, that about two hundred and forty-five of the men, women, and children out of those five hundred did indicate clearly enough their present wish to stay there; but they also said that it was the consent of captives, it was like agreeing to the terms of capitulation. General Miles said in his testimony before the committee, which I regret exceedingly my friend from Kansas did not hear, that it was just the terms which prisoners of war accede to; that to hold those Indians there without giving them an opportunity now to choose between the Territory and Dakota would be holding them as prisoners of war.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator from Massachusetts say that this amendment holds them there against their wishes?

Mr. DAWES. I will discuss that.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope so.

Mr. DAWES. I will read just what these four men recommend:

> That an allotment of one hundred and sixty acres of land be made to each man, woman, and child of the Ponca tribe of Indians, said lands to be selected by them on their old reservation in Dakota, or on the land now occupied by the Ponca Indians in the Indian Territory, within one year from the passage of an act of Congress granting such tracts of land. That until the expiration of this period free communication be permitted between the two branches of the tribe.

That is what these four men recommend. The President of the United States, in communicating their report, recommends—I read from his message:

> Ample time and opportunity should be given to the members of the tribe freely to choose their allotments, either on their old or new reservation.

My distinguished friend, the chairman of the committee, and the Senator from Kansas distinctly argue in support of this provision in the bill because it treats things as fixed, as they are now. I ask the Senator from Iowa to hear me.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am listening.

Mr. DAWES. I am addressing myself now to the Senator from Iowa farthest from me, [Mr. ALLISON.] They assume that these words hold the members of the tribe to the condition of what General Miles calls a capitulation.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Does the Senator state that from General Miles's testimony?

Mr. DAWES. General Miles said that to me. General Miles said, however, in the testimony that, looking to the future welfare of these Indians, it was absolutely necessary to give them hereafter a free choice.

The Senator from Iowa farthest from me [Mr. ALLISON] puts a question to me which has this significance: he means to intimate honestly and fairly, and with him I have no doubt it is so, that the words "according to their wishes" do give them this chance; but these two Senators here argue in support of these words that they do fix them where they are now. The question by the use of these words is left open whether it is meant that they have expressed their choice in the formal letter obtained from them when they said they had no other choice, or whether it means hereafter. In order to make it absolutely plain that it means that they shall have a choice hereafter, I modify the amendment so as to read, "to be hereafter expressed," and I modify it to meet an objection of the Senator from Kansas, and I say, "within six months." If it means that now, those words do not do any harm. If it means what two Senators upon this floor argue it should mean, then the question is fairly presented to the Senate whether these poor Indians shall have any choice hereafter. I cannot understand why it is that those who believe these Indians honestly and freely and without constraint have expressed their opinion can object to permission given them to express it over again.

Sir, I do not want to detain the Senate, but there is involved in this matter the question whether these poor human beings have any choice. What did White Eagle, Standing Bear, and the others testify? That the reason why they gave this consent was because they had no other choice. General Miles said he was satisfied in examining them down there that the choice was never presented to them between the Indian Territory and Dakota; that they were told they could not go back, and they had better make such terms as they could. With the strong arm of power upon their neck there has come from them this unwilling and reluctant consent; and now they are to be held to it by an act of Congress which refuses deliberately to give them an opportunity to say whether that is their own free consent or not. If it is their free consent I have nothing to say. Let them determine for themselves whether they will go back to the home that was wrenched from them, or take a new one in the Territory. I am for giving them that opportunity to consent. If that is their choice I have nothing to say; but if it is not their choice, if it has been wrung from them, this Government commits a wrong that no money paid to Indians will wipe out, if it wrenches from that tribe of Indians their home and refuses to give them the opportunity to go back.

I hope the Senator having charge of this bill [Mr. WALLACE] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] of the committee who prepared these amendments, if the words they have chosen mean what they intimate to me they do, will make them perfectly clear, because the Senator from Iowa near me, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] with entire frankness and openness, believes it would be wrong to give them that opportunity to consent anew, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] does, and they want it to be held just as it is.

Mr. WALLACE. I now ask unanimous consent that the five-minute rule be applied to further debate upon this bill. We shall not get through with the bill in time to have it enrolled otherwise. It appropriates some five million dollars, and we must pass it this afternoon or it will be lost.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator object to the amendment to the amendment? If the Senator accepts that amendment, it will be very easy to have a five-minute limit, as far as we are concerned.

Mr. WALLACE. This provision came to the Committee on Appropriations from the select committee indorsed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, in the language in which it is, and unless they shall change their recommendation I have no power to accept it.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand the select committee favor the amendment of my colleague.

Mr. SAUNDERS. What is the amendment of the Senator's colleague?

Mr. HOAR. The amendment of my colleague simply is, as I understand it, that the Indians are to be in one place or the other with their assent, to be expressed by the individual members of the tribe within six months, so that any Indian may take his choice whether he will be one of the old tribe or the new. That, I understand, is supported by a majority of the special committee of the Senate on that subject. I ask my friend from Pennsylvania if he objects to that?

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] represents on the Committee on Appropriations the Indian Committee. If he assents to it I am entirely content.

Mr. HOAR. I hope my friend from Iowa will assent to it.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senate wants to put that amendment in, it can vote it in.

Mr. HOAR. That is true, but it is proposed to limit debate.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; let us debate it. We put the amendment on in order that something may be done at this session for the benefit of these Poncas. If Senators are not satisfied with the clause and desire to amend it, so be it, and if the bill is lost the responsibility will be upon those who are not satisfied with what has been done by the committee.

Mr. HOAR. The bill is not in the least affected by the fact that the provision is passed in one shape or another. If this amendment is put on the bill will go through, and so if the amendment is not put on; but the question is as to the length of debate. The Senators who favor the amendment of my colleague might feel constrained to address the Senate about it at length if it is resisted by my friend from Iowa, because anything that he resists is in considerable peril in this world.

Mr. ALLISON. Thank you.

Mr. HOAR. My question, therefore, is whether the Senator from Iowa will agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania in making no objection to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not believe the amendment to the amendment ought to be put upon this bill in the form suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. How is the consent of each member of this tribe to be procured?

Mr. HOAR. The Secretary of the Interior has a good deal of authority about it; he will procure it.

Mr. ALLISON. Suppose they select first a piece of land in the Indian Territory, and then afterward, under the influence of some person outside of their reservation or on their reservation, they choose to go again to Dakota, to their old reservation?

Mr. HOAR. But of course one act of consent terminates the whole thing. There are persons who believe, of whom I am one, upon the evidence, just what the commission believe, that this tribal action has taken place under a great and imminent fear which dwelt upon the minds of those Indians. They were removed, as everybody agrees, from their homes to which they were attached, without fault on their part, in violation of the express act of Congress which declared they should only be removed with their consent. Having been so removed they struggled; some of their chiefs broke from the custody of the United States and were arrested. One of them having escaped, and being rearrested, was slain.

Mr. PLUMB rose.

Mr. HOAR. I do not want to be quoted now as dealing with the question of responsibility for that act.

Mr. PLUMB. Right there, does the Senator mean to say——

Mr. HOAR. I mean to say what I am about to say, which will be stated so clearly that my friend cannot misunderstand me. It is not a question who is responsible for the original act; it is not a question who is responsible for killing Big Snake. The result of what occurred was that a mortal and permanent fear dwelt upon the hearts and minds of those unoffending Indians. They thought that it was hopeless for them to appeal further to the justice or to the mercy of the Government of the United States, and their old men said to the young men, "This tribe will chafe till it perish unless it submits and gives its consent," as it is said, to this capitulation, as a prisoner of war might give his parole.

It is due to the honor of the United States that these men have some time, with the understanding that they have a choice to return to the homes which are theirs, an opportunity to make the election. The question whether an act is an act of national honor or national dishonor is not in the least affected by the character of the person who suffers by it; it is a question of the character of the nation that does it. That is the mistake which Great Britain and other nations have made. England says, We will be guilty of oppression to the Irishman, or to the Afghan, or to the Hindoo because of some real or fancied defects in the character and temper of the Irishman, or the Afghan, or the Hindoo. The United States plants itself on the doctrine that its own honor is in question when the justice or injustice of its action to the meanest human being that lives is concerned.

I say to my honorable friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that this is not the doctrine of Massachusetts sentimentalism; and when the bravest and most famous soldiers alive on our soil, thoroughly acquainted with the Indian character, appointed by the President of the United States, selected as the commission to report what honor and justice require at our hands, come to us and say that justice and honor require that there should be given to these persons now an opportunity to make this election after they have known that they are free agents in making it, which they have had every reason to doubt heretofore, will the Senate of the United States refuse to make what the honorable Senator from Iowa claims is the meaning of his measure now, so clear and plain that no man can mistake it?

Mr. WALLACE. I now insist that for the sake of this bill the Senate will allow the five-minute rule to be applied to further debate.

Mr. HOAR. I will not consent until this amendment is disposed of.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the Senator from Massachusetts object?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. EATON. Then as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and recognizing the necessity that this bill should pass within the coming twenty-four hours, I move to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I make the inquiry whether an amendment to an amendment being laid on the table does not carry the amendment with it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. DAWES. It has been so ruled by the Chair within a short time.

Mr. HOAR. I will not call it a menace, but after that movement of the Senator from Connecticut I will withdraw the objection to the limitation upon debate to five minutes.

Mr. EATON. Then I will withdraw, if I have the power, my motion to lay on the table.

Mr. WALLACE. Now I ask unanimous consent that the five-minute rule be applied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent of the Senate to apply the five-minute rule to further debate on this appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania objects. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall renew the motion made by the Senator from Connecticut if there is objection to applying the five-minute rule, and move to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

Mr. WALLACE. Does my colleague insist on the objection?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is withdrawn. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] asks to apply the five-minute rule to further debate on the appropriation bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WALLACE. I hope the vote will be taken on the amendment to the amendment now.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I think the Senate cannot refuse to allow these Indians to make their election. They were sent south in fraud of their treaty rights, and they have been kept there in fraud of their treaty rights. The Senate cannot do a wiser act than convince the Indians that they have some rights under the laws and the Constitution of the United States.

These Indians were taken from a reservation to which they had as perfect a title as any man in this country has to his own individual land. They were removed without the authority of law, and whether under a misconception of their rights under the treaty or not, they were still removed in fraud and in violence of their rights under the laws of the United States.

We have got to come to the point of recognizing that the humblest man in this country is entitled to all that the laws and the Constitution guarantee to him. The courts have sustained the Indians, so far as this question has been tried, in the assertion of the personal rights of liberty against unconstitutional law. The idea of the amendment to the amendment is simply that the Indians of the United States under our Government have some rights that our people are bound to recognize. If they had no rights that our people were bound to recognize, then what would they be? They would not be persons in the meaning of the Constitution.

The Congress of the United Sates cannot do itself more justice in the enactment of any law than to accept the amendment of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. That amendment proposes to say to the Indians of the Ponca tribe, "You have a perfect right, guaranteed to you by the most solemn sanction of the Government, to the lands upon which you reside or did reside at the time of your removal." Many of the Poncas have felt that their removal was in fraud of their rights; that it was an injustice. They still adhere to that opinion. When I say they still adhere to that opinion, I mean that the great body of the Ponca Indians, notwithstanding that which has been said by the Secretary of the Interior, do still adhere to the idea that they have a right to their land in Dakota.

The question then is presented whether we shall allow them to resort to that part of the territory of the United States which we have given them a treaty right to occupy, or shall the Senate now enact a law which deprives them of the privilege of having themselves that which we have guaranteed. I have on various occasions heard comments made in this body in reference to the rights of the negroes of the South——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The five minutes allowed to the Senator have expired.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I will ask consent to proceed for one moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed with his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORGAN. I thank the Senate for its courtesy. When we have been charged with excluding certain people from their rights under the Constitution of the United States, I do not wish to be a party to the invasion of any of the rights secured to the Indians by the supreme law of the United States, which we have no right to violate. Yet in the eyes of the Poncas that law has been violated and the Senate has evinced no feeling to restore these people to the rights of which they have been deprived. I desire that these Indians, the meanest and lowest with the best of them, shall enjoy under our Constitution and our laws the rights that belong to them. They have the right suggested in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to go to Dakota, and if the Senate deprives them of that right it simply violates the Constitution of the country by denying to the Indians those rights which belong to them under the supreme law of the land.

Mr. SAUNDERS. When this amendment was first offered I inclined to support it and asked the Senator to modify it to some extent, which he did; but I have made up my mind on looking it over further that it will be almost impossible to settle this question in this way. How are we to learn how this question is to be settled, or who is to settle it? No provision is made by the bill. No provision is made by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. Who is to attend to it? Who will ascertain it? Who will report it, and to whom will the report be made? I see so many difficulties in the way that it seems to me it is better to take the proposition as it stands than it would be to attempt to put such an amendment as that upon it. We have had this question before us for a long time in various shapes. That a blunder was committed in the start there is no kind of doubt in my mind. My own opinion is that the Congress of the United States committed the blunder in this case, and that was in appropriating a large amount of money for the removal of the Poncas, simply saying that their consent must be had before the removal. Everybody knows that those selected for the purpose manage in some way to get their consent to these things when they have a large amount of money at stake; and I say the blunder was first commenced by Congress itself; and now how we can get out of this difficulty and do justice is the question that ought to interest us at this time.

If I did not think that these Indians had pretty well settled this question among themselves as to whether they will go north or whether they will remain in the Indian Territory, I should be in favor of some kind of an amendment such probably as that brought forward by the Senator from Massachusetts; but the President of the United States sent a commission to talk to these Indians directly upon this subject; they did so; and they ascertained the precise number of Indians who wanted to remain in the Territory and those who wanted to go back to the old Ponca reservation in Dakota, as nearly as it could possibly be done or as it will be done by any other commission or by any other party if we adopt this amendment.

I think, under all the circumstances, that it is better to settle this question as they left it and as the committee have reported it, and that is to settle on the number that are there now as the number that shall remain in the Territory. This measure fixes that, and I have no doubt that things can be arranged in a reasonable time. We are not fixing any number; we are not saying there are so many in the Territory and so many to be provided for in Dakota; but we do say that those who are in the Territory and those who are going to Dakota shall have such and such appropriations made for them.

I do not know whether the committee are exactly correct in what they have done in one thing, and I call their attention to it now. I see that they appropriate $10,000 to be divided per capita among the Indians in the Territory, and the same amount to the Indians in Dakota. There may be a mistake in that. They ought to put it that each shall have the same amount, because I do not think there are as many in Dakota as there are in the Territory. I do not wish to move any amendment, but I want to call the attention of the committee to that point, that they probably are making a mistake which may cause trouble, because if we were to give the Indians in the Territory 50 per cent. more than the others they would not be satisfied. I shall now accept the amendment as offered by the Committee on Appropriations, and shall vote for it just as it is, because I think it is better to settle the question now than to keep it open longer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

A division being called for, there were—ayes 13, noes 23.

Mr. ALLISON. We may as well have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. What is the result of the count first? It has not been declared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirteen in the affirmative and 23 in the negative.

Mr. HOAR. No quorum voting.

Mr. WALLACE. The yeas and nays will show whether there is a quorum.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations from line 487 to line 512.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 512, to insert:

For the purpose of reimbursing the United States Treasury for a certain sum of money appropriated by this Congress for depredations committed by the Kiowa and Comanche and Sioux tribes of Indians, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to withhold from the annuities payable to said Indians an amount equal to said sum so appropriated; and he may withhold all of said sum out of the annuities due or to become due to said Indians in any one year, or otherwise, as between him and the Secretary of the Interior may be agreed upon, due reference being had to the care and welfare of said Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 523, to insert:

To pay Arthur J. Carrier, late Indian agent at the Ponca agency, Dakota, the sum of $2,313.60, being the amount advanced by him for the use of said agency during the first quarter of the year 1876 in excess of the official funds sent him for the use of said agency; and the further sums of $375, for salary as such agent for the first quarter of the year 1876, and $116.55, for expenses incurred from January 24 to March 28 in traveling upon official business; in all, $2,805.15; the same to be in full settlement and satisfaction of said claimant's account as Indian agent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 538, to insert:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in the settlement of the accounts of Isaac L. Mahan, Indian agent, are hereby authorized to adjust and settle the same upon the principles of equity and justice, and to award him credit for disbursements as appear to have been honestly made in good faith, and have inured to the benefit of the Indians or United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expense of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2165) to amend section 2297 of title 32 of the Revised Statutes, relating to homestead settlers; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GEORGE L. CONVERSE of Ohio, Mr. HENRY POEHLER of Minnesota, and Mr. W. D. WASHBURN of Minnesota, managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 5521) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and acts amendatory thereof, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 5521) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and acts amendatory thereof, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

HOMESTEAD SETTLEMENTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 2165) to amend section 2297 of title 32 of the Revised Statutes, relating to homestead settlers, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. PLUMB, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendment disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. BOOTH, Mr. WALKER, and Mr. PLUMB.

COMMITTEE ON LIBRARY ACCOMMODATIONS.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Joint Select Committee on additional accommodations for the Library of Congress is hereby continued and authorized to sit during the coming recess of Congress.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 1st instant approved and signed the following acts and joint resolutions:

An act (S. No. 326) for the relief of Henry F. Lines;

An act (S. No. 76) for the relief of M. F. Clark;

An act (S. No. 367) granting an increase of pension to Isabel L. Evans;

An act (S. No. 2184) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to appoint additional policemen for temporary service in the District, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 1905) changing the name of the First National Bank of West Meriden, in the county of New Haven and State of Connecticut; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 156) in relation to the international exhibition of 1883.

The message also announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. No. 1181) for the relief of Dodd, Brown & Co., of Saint Louis, Missouri;

An act (S. No. 753) to provide for the sale of the remainder of the reservation of the Confederated Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians in the State of Nebraska and Kansas, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 79) directing the Secretary of War to investigate the claim of the State of Florida against the United States for expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities in said State between the years 1855 and 1860, and to report the result of such investigation to Congress.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Post Office Department," in the appropriations for the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, in line 551, to reduce the appropriation "for supplying paper" from $20,000 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 554, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty" and insert "forty;" so as to make the clause read:

For railway post-office clerks and for route-agents, $40,000, to be equally divided between these two branches of the service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 558 to 560, in the following words:

For wrapping-twine for blank-agency office, $5,172.47.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 560, to insert:

For letter balances and scales, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 561, to insert:

For publication of additional copies of the Official Postal Guide, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations "for office of disbursing clerk and superintendent of Post-Office building," in line 573, to increase the appropriation "for telegraphing" from $500 to $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 574, to increase the appropriation "for miscellaneous items" from $1,000 to $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 601, to insert:*

SENATE.

For twenty-two clerks to committees and eighteen pages, a sum sufficient to pay them during the special session of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 605, to insert:

For salaries of officers, clerks, messengers, and others receiving an annual salary in the services of the Senate, a sum sufficient to pay them, and the twelve laborers, during the special session of the Senate.

Mr. WALLACE. In line 608 the words "them and" should be stricken out; so as to read "a sum sufficient to pay the twelve laborers during the special session of the Senate." It was only intended to appropriate sufficient to provide for the twelve laborers during the special session of the Senate; and there is a misprint or mistake of some kind.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment was, after line 609, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay to the messengers in his office the difference between their present pay and that of messengers of the Senate of the United States, from July 1, 1880, to June 30, 1881, $144 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 615, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay J. S. Hickox for services as assistant in folding-room, from July 1, 1880, to June 30, 1881, inclusive, $240, this amount being the difference between the pay which he receives and that of assistants in the document-room.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 622, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay J. P. Ringgold for services as clerk in folding-room, from July 1 to December 31, 1880, inclusive, $240, this amount being the difference between the pay of clerk and that of laborer received by him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 628, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay George T. Howard the difference between his pay as a mail carrier and that of a messenger of the Senate of the United States, from July 1, 1878, to June 30, 1879, $240.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 634, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay George W. Kennedy the difference between his present pay and that of a messenger of the Senate of the United States, from December 1, 1879, to March 1, 1881, $428.80.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 640, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay D. W. Carroll for services in the folding-room, $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 643, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay L. Cowles the difference between his present pay and that of a skilled laborer, for the current fiscal year, $280.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 647, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay J. J. Sanborn for twenty days' services as clerk to the Committee on Treasury Accounts during the fiscal year 1879, $120.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 651, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to reimburse the Capitol police for expense of uniforms and equipments they were required to procure, $356.40.

Mr. WALLACE. I move as a substitute for the clause:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to reimburse the Capitol police for the uniforms and equipments they were required to provide, the sum of $3,056.40, being the equivalent of one month's pay at the rate of compensation now paid to each of them.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 665, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay G. M. Wight for one cylinder-desk furnished the Senate during the fiscal year 1879, $125.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "House of Representatives," after line 724, to insert:

To pay H. W. Spofford additional for services as clerk to the Committees on Foreign Affairs and Census, $1,125.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 727, to insert:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay J. B. Holloway balance of salary due him as assistant clerk to the Committee on War Claims, from July 2, 1879, to November 30, 1879, $658.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 733, to insert:

To pay A. W. C. Nowlin, Postmaster of the House of Representatives, the difference between the pay of Postmaster and that of assistant postmaster, for the period of time between the 7th of October, 1880, and the 15th of December, 1880, he having acted as Postmaster of the House during that time, $92.39.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "District of Columbia," after line 765, to insert:

To supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the Reform School, and for temporary clerks employed in the office of the collector of taxes, in the District of Columbia, for the fiscal year 1881, one-half of which is to be paid by said District, namely:

For support and maintenance of Reform School, $6,000.

For pay of temporary clerks in the office of the collector of taxes, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 774, to insert:

Government Hospital for the Insane:

Current expenses, Government Hospital for the Insane: For support, clothing, and treatment in the Government Hospital for the Insane of the insane of the Army and Navy, Marine Corps, and revenue-cutter service, and of all persons who have become insane since their entry into the military or naval service of the United States, and who are indigent, and of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia, $11,250.

For necessary repairs, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 785, to insert:

And the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to pass to the credit of Charles H. Nicholls, late superintendent of the Government Hospital for the Insane, the sum of $3,037.09, that being the amount disallowed in his accounts, and being the difference in salary between $2,500 and $4,000 per annum from June 22, 1874, to June 30, 1876; said disallowance having been made to conform to the requirements of the Revised Statutes, section 4839, adopted June 22, 1874; and the salary of the said superintendent is hereby fixed at $4,000 per annum, as originally provided in act of March 2, 1867.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out sections 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 of the bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. Is it necessary now to express my views why the amendment should not be concurred in?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is to be acted on now, unless reserved.

Mr. VOORHEES. These sections, 3, 4. 5, 6, and 7, which the Committee on Appropriations propose to strike out relate to a matter connected with the Miami Indians of Indiana, and these sections ought not to be stricken out. By a treaty made between the Miami tribe of Indians and the United States Government, in 1854, the following stipulation was made, which I ask the Senate to hear:

The sum of $231,004 hereby stipulated to be paid to the Miami Indians of Indiana shall be held by the United States for said last-named Indians, and by the Government invested as the President may direct, at an interest of 5 per cent. per annum, and which interest shall be paid annually, for the period of twenty-five years, to the said Miami Indians of Indiana, and at the expiration of that time, or sooner if required by them and approved by the President, the principal sum to be paid in full, the United States being directly responsible therefor, said investment to be made and the interest thereon to commence accruing the 1st day of July, 1855, and thence to continue.

By a subsequent provision of the treaty the sum of $9,746.14 was to be paid to certain persons mentioned in the treaty, making the sum remaining due just the amount stated in the third section of this bill, the sum of $221,257.86. This sum according to the provisions of the treaty fell due on the 1st of last July. At that time the twenty-five years spoken of in the treaty had elapsed and the sum became due and payable upon the part of the Government.

This provision was offered in the sundry civil bill a year ago in order to pay off this debt and stop the interest. It was rejected then, as I thought without sufficient cause on the part of the Senate. This is simply a debt due by treaty stipulation for the sum named at the expiration of twenty-five years. The twenty-five years, as I have already said, expired on the 1st of last July.

Now if any Senator or any member of this committee can explain to me why we want to keep the money of these Indians and pay 5 per cent. interest upon it, I shall be glad to be corrected. We are holding this money and paying 5 per cent. upon it. There is no question about whom the money belongs to. There is no question but what it is due and payable, and that the Indians now want it, and it is theirs; and yet when the provision to pay it to them comes here from the House the Senate Committee on Appropriations propose to reject it and keep on paying 5 per cent. interest for trust funds which we hold.

Let me call the attention of Senators to another fact. These provisions of this deficiency bill were prepared by the Committee on Appropriations of the House, and by that committee submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, by him submitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, by him submitted to the assistant attorney-general for the Interior Department, and it came back to the Committee on Appropriations of the House with the approval of every one of these officers and their recommendation that it should be put in this bill, and that the money should be paid to these Indians and this interest account stopped. This provision also had the unanimous approval of the Committee on Appropriations of the House; there was not a dissenting member; and why the Appropriations Committee of the Senate should stand here insisting that this account shall be kept up with the Miami Indians of Indiana, why we should retain this $221,275.86 and pay interest on it after it is due, after the twenty-five years have elapsed, when there is no more question about our duty to pay it than there would be to pay any other debt, is a mystery to me and calls for explanation, and unless a satisfactory explanation can be given I hope the Senate will not concur with the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. WALLACE. I can only say that the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate had no information whatever in reference to these sections, except that which they found in the bill itself. The proposition came from no committee of the Senate, was not submitted to the Indian Committee, and had no approval from any one; there was nothing before us except the mere sections in the bill. Such a provision was proposed in the bill of last year, as the Senator says, and if it had so much merit that it ought to go upon that bill and should continue upon this one, why was it not put through in the form of a separate bill? Why did not Congress take it up and pass it since last year? The committee simply struck out the section because it was an appropriation of over $200,000, without any information in their possession and without the indorsement of any committee of this body.

Mr. VOORHEES. Why, Mr. President, I am astonished at the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania that this measure came before that committee without the approval of any committee and without recommendation. It came from the House of Representatives with the unanimous report of the Committee on Appropriations there, sustained by the entire Interior Department, embracing the Secretary, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the assistant attorney-general for that Department, and but a short time ago one of the most prominent members of the House Appropriations Committee came to my seat and called my attention to these facts.

Further, the Senator from Pennsylvania says that they had no information on this subject. I am not one of those who will say that he ought to have known what was in the treaty. I know how pressed and careworn and hurried members of that committee always are in the latter days of a Congress; and it is one of the evils and one of the vices of legislation that within the last few hours we have to pass in this hurry and often in an imperfect manner upon great questions. I therefore do not charge the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania with not being informed on the subject of this treaty, yet it is public law; it is here before the Senate. It calls for the payment of this money at the expiration of twenty-five years. The treaty went into effect on the 1st of July, 1855. The 1st of July, 1880, makes the twenty-five years, and from that time on this money is due and payable, not as an appropriation in the ordinary sense of that term from money in the Treasury, but to pay a trust fund which while we keep it we pay 5 per cent. upon.

That is the naked proposition, and the Senator from Pennsylvania when he says that it is here without support is mistaken. It is supported by the terms of the treaty; it is supported by the Committee on Appropriations of the House; it is supported by the entire Interior Department, and I hope the Senate will pause before they strike out a provision so just to the Indians and so just to ourselves in point of economy, for we are not in the money markets of the world asking out of the coffers of the red men or white men to borrow money at 5 per cent. interest. We want to stop such an interest account as that.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, what I said was that this was in the bill without any indorsement by any committee of this body and without any information to the Appropriations Committee of this body from any one save that they found it in the bill. It is not usual to pursue the line indicated by the Senator from Indiana in placing legislation of this kind upon an appropriation bill. This is legislation, and it should have gone to the proper committees of this body if it was intended to be placed upon a deficiency bill. This is not a deficiency. It may be justly due and owing to these Indians, but it is not a deficiency. It comes here simply with the indorsement of the House without the indorsement of our committees, and it is not a deficiency such as this bill is intended to provide for. I trust the Senate will sustain the committee.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not know whether, under the rule we are operating upon, I am entitled to speak again or not. I know I have not spoken beyond five minutes, but whether I have a right to speak more than once I do not know. If I have, I want to say that the Senator from Pennsylvania had better not make a point on the question of whether this is a deficiency or not. If that point was made and the plowshare of strict construction was run from end to end of this bill, four-fifths of it would be turned under the sod on the question of whether the items are for deficiencies or not. There is scarcely one in five that would stand such a test, and, so far as appears from the face of them, forty-nine out of fifty, I think, would require explanation to make them appear as deficiencies. This is as legitimate and as fair legislation for this bill as four-fifths of the other provisions in it.

Mr. WALLACE. Why, Mr. President, the Senator is grossly mistaken. I trust he will recognize the fact that he is mistaken when I hold up to him the book containing estimates of the items here appropriated for with reference to page and letter. So far from being (a large proportion of this bill) new matter, it is almost entirely found in the estimates of deficiencies submitted to us for the current fiscal year. They are appropriated specifically by names and items; the whole of the second section particularly refers to items found in this book by page and by item, and nearly all the first section is the same. In this I know my honorable friend from Indiana will see his mistake.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not want to make any point on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out the sections which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the sum of $221,257.86 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to pay the Miami Indians, of Indiana, the principal sum that became due them on the 1st day of July, 1880, in accordance with the amended fourth article of the treaty concluded with said Indians on the 5th day of June, 1854, and ratified on the 4th day of August, 1854.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior shall appoint a competent and proper person to take a census and make a list of the Miami Indians residing in Indiana, or elsewhere, who are entitled to participate in the distribution of said principal sum, as provided by article 4 of the treaty that was made between the United States and the Miami Indians on the 5th day of June, 1854, as amended in the Senate. Before taking such census, publication shall be made requiring all persons claiming under said treaty to make known their claim to such person so appointed, within a time specified in the notice, and failing so to do, they shall be forever barred. When said census shall be so made, it shall be the duty of the person so appointed to make such enumeration and list to report the same to the Secretary of the Interior, distinguishing in his report between males and females, and between those over twenty-one years of age and those under twenty-one years, which list so made, when approved by the Secretary of the Interior, shall stand as the true list of the persons entitled to share in the payments provided for in this act; and each person named in said list shall be entitled to receive the same amount, irrespective of age or sex, payments for minors to be paid to the guardians legally appointed, as hereinafter provided, under the laws of the State or Territory in which said minors reside: Provided, however, That any minor who may be a resident of the Indian Territory and a beneficiary of said fund may receive his or her share therof, as the case may be, through a guardian appointed by any court having probate jurisdiction in the State of Kansas. The person appointed to make such enumeration and list, shall, before entering on such duty, take and subscribe an oath that he will make a true and correct enumeration and report of said Indians according to the best information he can obtain, said oath to be administered and certified to by a United States commissioner or a clerk of a court of record; and he shall receive as his compensation therefor the sum of $5 per day and his actual and necessary traveling and other expenses while engaged in said duty, not to exceed $400: Provided, That no persons other than those embraced in the corrected list agreed upon by the Miami Indians of Indiana, in the presence of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in June, 1854, comprising three hundred and two names as Miami Indians of Indiana, and the increase of families of persons indicated in said corrected list, shall be recipients of the money hereby appropriated.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior shall appoint some suitable person as an agent of the United States to make payment to each of said Miami Indians who shall be more than twenty-one years of age whose name shall be borne on the list prepared as aforesaid the amount that he or she, as the case may be, shall be entitled to receive; and he, in like manner, shall pay to the guardian of each minor whose name shall appear on said list the amount that said minor shall be entitled to receive: Provided, however, That no payment shall be made to any guardian as such until he produce and deliver to the agent from whom he shall receive such payment the certificate of the judge of the court, attested by the seal of the same, certifying that such guardian has been duly appointed and qualified as such, and given bond, secured by unencumbered freehold surety, in the penalty of not less than three times the amount he shall receive from the United States on account of the payment so to be made for the benefit of said ward, which certificate shall be filed by said agent at the time of making of his report and final settlement. A copy of said list so prepared as aforesaid shall be furnished to said agent, for his guidance in the performance of the duties aforesaid, by the Secretary of the Interior. Said agent shall take the receipt of the persons so paid, attested in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe, which receipt shall be a voucher for said agent in the final settlement of his accounts. Said agent shall receive, in full compensation for the services required by the provisions of this act, a sum equal to three-fourths of 1 per cent. on the amount that he shall receive. The agent so appointed to make said payments shall, before entering on such duty, take and subscribe an oath, before some United States commissioner or clerk of some court of record, for the faithful performance of the duties imposed by the provisions of this act, and make and execute a bond, payable to the United States, in such penalty and with such security as the Secretary of the Interior shall require and approve. And the receipt of the sum due under this bill shall be a final discharge by each party so receiving of all claims whatsoever under said treaty against the United States Government.

SEC. 6. That there shall be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, to pay the agents whom the Secretary of the Interior shall appoint for the services and expenses required by the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to examine the claim of Isaac Vandeventer and James F. McDowell, attorneys at law, partners under the name of Vandeventer & McDowell, for services rendered in the defense of certain suits in the courts of the State of Indiana in relation to the taxation and partition of the lands of the band of Meshingomesia in said State, and for alleged services rendered said band in and about legislation by Congress affecting their said lands and the partition of their lands pursuant thereto, and allow and pay to said attorneys such reasonable compensation as he may find legally or equitably due them for said services, out of the moneys due to said band, or out of the money due to any of said band, as he may deem just. And to enable the Secretary to properly examine said accounts, he may cause or permit testimony to be taken by said claimants and by said band, or by any individual or individuals of said band, under such rules as he may prescribe: Provided, That in making any such payment no part of the same shall be deducted from the share of any member of said band who received no part of the land so partitioned, nor shall any part of any such payment be deducted from the share of any member of said band whose membership was contested, and who was required by proof to establish such membership to entitle him or her to share in the partition of said land.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 27——

Mr. HARRIS. It is evident there is no quorum voting, and I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I should like to know what the vote is on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is on striking out the sections which have just been read.

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish simply to say in addition to what I said before, for the information of the Senator from Illinois, that the vote to strike out will be to strike out an appropriation recommended by the Department, that comes here with the approval of the Committee on Appropriations of the House to pay the Miami Indians, of Indiana, a debt over due, and that stands to their credit now and has been for years at 5 per cent. interest. Those who vote with the committee vote to keep that money and continue to pay 5 per cent. to the Indians when they want their money, and when it has been due since the 1st of July under express treaty stipulations.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Allison,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Plumb,
Anthony,	Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Rollins,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. I offer the following by direction of the Committee on Appropriations to come in on page 28, after line 659:

To enable the Joint Select Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress to complete the payment for plans, designs, and other expenses incurred, $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. I also move by direction of the Committee on Appropriations on page 1, line 10, in the clause making appropriations to pay judgments of the United States Court of Claims, the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That this appropriation shall be applied only to the payment of judgments of the Court of Claims unappealed or to judgments entered in accordance with mandates of the Supreme Court where such mandates have been issued prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. On page 6, line 129, after the word "twenty," I move to insert "five;" so as to read:

Furniture and repairs of furniture, and carpets, for all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. In the next clause, line 133, I move, after the word "fifty," to insert "five;" so as to read:

For fuel, light, and water, and miscellaneous items required by the janitors and firemen in the proper care of the public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, $55,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. On page 9, line 186, after the word "years," I move to strike out "$1,813.81" and insert "$2,345.77;" so as to make the clause read:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the just contribution to the maintenance of the International Bureau of Weights and Measures, in conformity with the terms of the convention of May 20, 1875, for 1881 and prior years, $2,345.77.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. On page 4, after line 69, I move to insert:

For the legislative expenses of the extra session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona, $6,150.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. On page 9, after line 194, I move to insert:

To pay Solomon Spitzer $12,500 losses incurred by him as weigher of imports at the port of New York during the year 1879.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. On page 32, at the end of line 774, I move to insert:

For salary of inspector of plumbing to the 30th of June, 1881, $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

I simply desire to say that that office has been created since the estimates were sent in, and it is proper that the provision should be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I offer the following amendment recommended by the commissioners of the District of Columbia. I will have the letter explanatory of it from the commissioners read if it be necessary, to come in immediately after the last amendment adopted:

For salaries and contingent expenses, offices of the District of Columbia, 1880.

Executive office proper:
Contingent expenses	$76 75
Fuel, ice, repairs, general miscellaneous expenses, &c., for District offices.	345 44
Public schools:
Repairs to school building	388 22
Contingent expenses	1,223 10
Metropolitan police:
Contingent expenses	436 88
Fire Department:
Fuel	369 53
Washington Asylum:
Contingent expenses	88 82
Transportation of paupers and prisoners, District of Columbia:
Transportation of paupers	118 42
Miscellaneous expenses, District of Columbia:
Rent of market site, &c	233 33

Mr. WALLACE. As these seem to be deficiencies proper and come from the proper officers of the District, the committee make no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. On page 13, at the end of line 289, I offer an amendment, which I will read and send to the Clerk.

For continuing investigation of and more speedily settling claims under the act of July 4, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof, the sum of $5,000, to pay salaries and expenses of additional agents and clerks to examine such claims, and incidental expenses, to be immediately available.

Several SENATORS. What sort of claims?

Mr. COCKRELL. For quartermaster and commissary stores.

Mr. CONKLING. Claims in insurrectionary States?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; from the non-insurrectionary States.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Does the act of 1864 relate to claims originating in particular States?

Mr. COCKRELL. For quartermaster and commissary stores.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I should like to see the act.

Mr. WALLACE. This item is estimated for in the Book of Estimates of deficiencies, but by some means has been omitted from the bill. I send to the Clerk, and for publication in the RECORD, a letter from the Secretary of War to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, explaining it, which can be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, March 3, 1881.

SIR: In view of the omission from the appropriation bills of the amount estimated as adequate to properly continue the examination of claims in the Quartermaster-General's office during the present fiscal year, I have the honor to earnestly urge that the omission be supplied in the deficiency or the sundry civil appropriation bill by an appropriation of $50,000 for "incidental expenses, Quartermaster's Department," to be immediately available.

This recommendation is based upon an application from the Quartermaster-General, in person, who states that the interests of the service manifestly require immediate action. (See House Executive Document 44, current series, page 13.)

Respectfully,

ALEX. RAMSEY,
Secretary of War.

Hon. HENRY G. DAVIS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I desire to say a word. I think we have gone far enough in this claims business in behalf of the class of people that this amendment extends to. I regard a person who has been pardoned by the Executive of the United States as having just as good right to come here and ask that compensation shall be made to him for any loss he may have suffered as the description of persons embraced in this amendment. I imagine that the claims of that class would not be allowed, and we shall be brought into great trouble and difficulty about determining the question of loyalty. Loyal citizens of States not rebellious are the persons included. I suppose the State of Missouri and the State of Kentucky would fall within that category, while a loyal citizen in Tennessee, in Florida, in Alabama would not be able to get any benefit out of this law. I believe in equality; equality is equity, and I think that a loyal citizen in any of the States of the Union has just as much claim upon the Government as a loyal citizen in the States which are embraced within the terms of this amendment. I am opposed to all kinds of legislation like that. I think the time has come for it to end. I think this is a country that ought to be regarded as a common country. When you speak of loyal citizens of States not adhering to the rebellion I do not understand it. I never had a great deal of rebellious spirit within me; but I am for justice, I am for right, and I do not think that this amendment ought to be passed unless it is made to embrace everybody who has claims against this Department within all the States of the Union, North and South, and who can come within the descriptive term of "loyal citizens."

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to suggest to him that this amendment does not raise the question that he is discussing?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all. It has nothing to do with it.

Mr. LOGAN. This amendment of the Senator from Missouri does not raise that question at all. The amendment only provides for carrying out the law as it exists. It is not a question as to what the law ought to have been or what it ought to be now.

Mr. McMILLAN. It would be out of order if it did.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly. It is simply a question of appointing agents and paying them to investigate the character of claims already filed under this law, which does exist, and it is certainly proper and asked for and should be done in order to facilitate the decision of the claims filed under this law. It is not a question as to what the law should be.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair reminds the Senator from Florida that his time has expired. Is there objection to his proceeding?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection as far as he is concerned.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I was speaking of the law as it now exists. This amendment is to make more effective the provisions of the law of 1864, and that law is in the terms I have stated that these claims can only be preferred by loyal citizens of States not adhering to the rebellion. I will not vote one dollar to facilitate the further carrying out of that law. I am perfectly willing for it to terminate as it did and for everybody to get all he can under it; but when it is proposed to give it more vitality than it now has, I am not for it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer this additional amendment on the recommendation of the Secretary of War and the Quartermaster-General to be inserted after line 616, on page 26:

All claims submitted to the Quartermaster-General, United States Army, under the provisions of an act of July 4, 1864, and amendatory acts, which he has caused to be examined and which are awaiting his action at any time, may be examined by any military officer designated by the President for such duty; and if said officer is "convinced that the claim is just, and of the loyalty of the claimant, and that the stores have been actually received or taken for the use of and used by the Army," he shall certify such facts to the Quartermaster-General, who shall thereupon be relieved from any further examination of such claim, and shall report the same to the Third Auditor of the Treasury with recommendation for settlement: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the suspension or rejection of any of said claims found to be not just or not properly supported by proof of loyalty: And provided further, That in all claims arising under said act, and the amendatory acts, acted upon as provided by law, the claimant or claimants may, where questions of law are alone involved, appeal to the Secretary of War, under such regulations as may be prescribed.

Now I ask that a letter be read from the Quartermaster-General just received this morning.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 3, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to letter of the Secretary of War in regard to completing the investigation of claims for quartermaster stores under the act of 4th July, 1864, printed in Executive Document No. 11, part 2, House of Representatives, Forty-sixth Congress, third session.

The accumulation of these claims unsettled, the death and removal of claimants and witnesses, the long time already elapsed since they originated, make some such provision very necessary at this time in the general deficiency bill now in the Senate.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General United States Army.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL,
United States Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. The act of July 4, 1864, as to claims presented to the Quartermaster-General for quartermaster supplies furnished in non-insurrectionary States, required that he should examine them, and if he were satisfied of the loyalty of the claimant and the justice of a claim he should allow it. The Quartermaster-General holds that under the law he must personally pass upon each claim that is presented. This amendment is simply to enable the President of the United States to designate one or more officers of the War Department who can exercise the power vested in the Quartermaster-General under the law.

I hold in my hand Executive Document, House of Representatives, No. 11, part 2, Forty-sixth Congress, third session, "claims arising under act of July 4, 1864." The Secretary recommends—

An amendment of section 300 A, Revised Statutes, second edition, to substantially enact: That all claims submitted to the Quartermaster-General of the United States under the provisions of an act of July 4, 1864, and amendatory acts, which he has caused to be examined, and which are awaiting his action at any time, may be examined by any military officer designated by the President for the duty, and if said officer is "convinced that the claim is just, and of the loyalty of the claimant, and that the stores have been actually received or taken for the use of and used by the Army," he shall certify such facts to the Quartermaster-General, who shall thereupon be relieved from any further examination of that claim, and shall report the case to the Third Auditor of the Treasury with recommendation for settlement: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the suspension or rejection of any of said claims found to be not just or not properly supported in proof of loyalty.

It is recommended that the means above suggested be granted by Congress, and that the law be further so amended as to provide for an appeal to the Secretary of War in cases where questions of law are alone involved.

This amendment is in the precise language recommended by the Secretary of War, prepared by the Quartermaster-General.

Now, Mr. President, is there any necessity for this? I will read from the Quartermaster-General's report:

The number of cases presented during six months from July 1, 1879, to January 1, 1880, including the Indiana Morgan-raid cases and claims from Pennsylvania, is 12,757, amounting to $7,527,051.56.

* * * * * * *

The number and amount of unsettled claims filed and undergoing official examination and preparation for my action may be stated in round numbers at about five thousand, amounting to about two million seven hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

The number and amount of claims filed which have not yet been taken up for examination, including, however, those in the hands of officers for investigation but not yet investigated, approximate 16,500 cases, calling for about eight million six hundred and sixty-two thousand five hundred dollars.

The number of claims now about ready and awaiting my individual action as Quartermaster-General is 2,150, approximating in amount the sum of $1,129,275.

* * * * * * *

The number of cases investigated and reported on by officers and agents during the last fiscal year was 3,267, costing for services and expenses of agents employed in making the investigations the sum of $98,971.85, which is equivalent to an average of a little over thirty dollars for each claim. At the same rate of time and cost, it will require about five years and $495,000 to investigate the 16,800 claims not yet investigated, amounting to over eight million five hundred thousand dollars.

Much expense can be saved by hastening the work of investigations required to be made by agents. If Congress should be requested to make any additional appropriation for the purpose of hastening this work, I think it would be wise to make the estimate therefor large enough to warrant the employment of a sufficient force of agents to increase the number of investigations to at least double the number made during the past fiscal year.

* * * * * * *

The Quartermaster-General cannot find sufficient time in the midst of his other duties to personally examine for final decision under the law these cases as fast as they are prepared for him by the present force. So long as the law remains as it is at present, requiring the Quartermaster-General himself to examine and report upon each case presented to him, it is not believed that much more than the usual annual number of cases can be finally disposed of. Twenty-three thousand six hundred and fifty cases is a very large docket for one judge or arbitrator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. WALLACE. I am compelled to make the point of order on this amendment. It is general legislation upon an appropriation bill, and it comes here without any recommendation of a committee.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the point of order is sustained, it will relieve me from making any remarks upon the amendment proposed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported again. The Chair did not scrutinize it closely.

Mr. COCKRELL. It unquestionably amends the existing law. There is no question about that, if the Senator insists upon his point of order. It has been recommended by the Secretary of War and the Quartermaster-General, and is very appropriate.

Mr. LOGAN. It is out of order, however, if the point is insisted upon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I admit that if the point is insisted upon, it is out of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is made, and the amendment will not be received.

Mr. FERRY. I notice several amendments giving extra pay to messengers of the Senate. I take it the committee inadvertently omitted the messenger of the Reporter's room. I send to the Chair an amendment to come in at the end of line 640.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 640 it is proposed to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay George A. Clarke, messenger of the Reporter's room of the Senate, the difference between his present pay and that of a messenger of the Senate of the United States from July 1, 1880, to June 30, 1881, $240.

Mr. FERRY. The committee, I understand, have no objection to this amendment, and I hope it will be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise now to call up the amendment presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] yesterday, and I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to accept the amendments to it which I have already exhibited to him.

Mr. HOAR. I accept them.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that it was agreed unanimously yesterday that this amendment should be presented.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Let us hear it read first.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to ask the Senator from Vermont is not his amendment to come in at the latter part of the bill?

Mr. MORRILL. At the end.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow a few amendments, that are very small in their character, to be offered first, and then when they are passed upon this matter can be taken up and discussed?

Mr. MORRILL. I should have no objection myself to that course, but there are one or two members of the Finance Committee who desire to leave, and want to be here when this amendment is discussed.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely made the suggestion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Let us hear the amendment read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill the following additional sections:

SEC. —. That all existing provisions of law authorizing the refunding of the national debt shall apply to any bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 4½ per cent. per annum which may hereafter become redeemable: Provided, That in lieu of the bonds authorized to be issued by the act of July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and the acts amendatory thereto, and the certificates authorized by the act of February 26, 1879, entitled "An act to authorize the issue of certificates of deposit in aid of the refunding of the public debt," the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue bonds to an amount not exceeding $400,000,000, of denominations of $50, or some multiple of that sum, which shall bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, redeemable, at the pleasure of the United States, after five years, and payable twenty years from the date of issue; and also Treasury notes to an amount not exceeding $300,000,000, in denominations of $10, or some multiple of that sum, not exceeding $1,000, either registered or coupon, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, redeemable, at the pleasure of the United States, after one year, and payable in ten years from the date of issue; and no Treasury note of a less denomination than $100 shall be registered. The bonds and Treasury notes shall be, in all other respects, of like character and subject to the same provisions as the bonds authorized to be issued by the act of July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and acts amendatory thereto: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize an increase of the public debt: Provided further, That interest upon the 6 per cent. bonds hereby authorized to be refunded shall cease at the expiration of thirty days after publication of notice that the same have been designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for redemption.

SEC. —. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to authorize public subscriptions, at not less than par, to be received at all depositories of the United Statess and at all national banks, and such other banks as he may designate, for the bonds and for the Treasury notes herein provided for, for thirty days before he shall contract for or award any portion of said bonds or Treasury notes to any syndicate of individuals or bankers, or otherwise than under such public subscriptions; and if it shall happen that more than the entire amount of said bonds and Treasury notes, or of either of them, has been subscribed within said thirty days, he shall award the full amount subscribed to all persons who shall have made bona fide subscriptions, in order of time of said subscriptions, at rates most advantageous to the United States.

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, if in his opinion it shall become necessary, to use from time to time not exceeding $50,000,000 of the standard gold and silver coin in the Treasury in the redemption of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds of the United States authorized to be refunded by the provisions of this act, which shall from time to time be repaid and replaced out of the proceeds of the sale of the bonds or Treasury notes authorized by this act; and he may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds or Treasury notes authorized by this act: Provided, That the bonds and Treasury notes so purchased or redeemed shall constitute no part of the sinking fund, but shall be canceled.

Mr. MORRILL. It will be seen that this is an amendment of an important character, and unless this amendment shall prevail there will be no refunding act passed at this session. It is a measure so important that if it fails it may be thought necessary to have a called session to remedy the default. I desire to say that the amendment presented contains the funding bill as passed by the Senate and the House with the exception of the fifth section. In all important respects, in every vital point, it is precisely the measure which has been agreed to by both Houses at the present session.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Does the Senator conceive that this amendment is in accordance with the rule of the Senate which prohibits legislation on an appropriation bill?

Mr. MORRILL. Yesterday consent was given if this amendment should be approved by the Committee on Finance that it might be presented, and that agreement was made unanimously. I must in frankness say that the Committee on Finance were unable at the morning session of the committee to obtain a quorum. Some members of the committee being on the Committee on Appropriations, were up all night, or nearly so, and were not present; but the majority of the committee have authorized me to report the amendment here this morning.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand the Senator to say that the Senate unanimously agreed that this amendment should be received as in order?

Mr. MORRILL. I do so say, and if the Senator will look at page 62 of to-day's RECORD he will see the agreement.

Mr. COCKRELL. I thought I heard everything that was done yesterday, and I certainly never consented to anything of that kind.

Mr. HOAR. Unanimous consent was given distinctly. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] was in the chair, and it was fully announced.

Mr. WALLACE. I regret very much to say that I never heard of any such agreement.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that when assent was asked for it was inquired by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON:]

Is it understood that there is no objection to that course?

Then the Presiding Officer said:

It is. The objection under Rule 27 will be waived.
Under any rule—

Said the Senator from Iowa—

That is, this amendment, if agreed to by the Committee on Finance, may be offered to the deficiency bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was only in regard to the reference of the amendment, not to any point of order.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said:

Notwithstanding the rule.

The Presiding Officer replied:

Notwithstanding the rule.

Clearly the assent of the Senate was given for the introduction of this amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. I make the point of order against it.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to say for myself that I have never, either as a member of the Committee on Appropriations or a member of the Senate, given any intimation of a purpose not to raise the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that no Senator who is in favor of doing anything on a subject so important as this is will make a point of order about a matter which he certainly approves in his own conscience.

Mr. McPHERSON. Did I understand the Senator from Vermont to say that the amendment is exactly the bill passed by the Senate with the exception of the fifth section?

Mr. MORRILL. I say that it is in substance. Some of the phraseology is different, but it is in substance exactly what has been agreed to by both Houses at the present session.

Mr. McPHERSON. On reference to the amendment submitted by the honorable Senator from Vermont, I see that no provision is made for limiting the expenditure by the Secretary of the Treasury, and I offer an amendment to come in at the end of the amendment limiting——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont is not yet before the Senate for action. The point of order is made upon it.

Mr. WALLACE. I made the point of order upon it by instruction of the committee, that it is general legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say, and I desire that the Senator from Arkansas then in the chair will listen to what I say——

Mr. HARRIS. Is the question of order debatable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not until the Chair has decided it and an appeal is taken.

Mr. HARRIS. At this late day of the session, I raise the question of order that it is not debatable.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Tennessee to permit me to state to the Senate my recollection in regard to unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course I will yield to hear a statement as to unanimous consent; but I beg to say that I have never heard of any request for such consent; I have never given any such consent; and I do not propose to give any such consent.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator is now debating something which he objects to. Yesterday, the honorable Senator from Arkansas being in the chair, I offered this amendment, and asked that it be read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I would be very glad to have my honorable friend from Tennessee hear this; I expect to have him with me after he hears what I say. Thereupon the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] said:

That ought to go to the Committee on Finance.

To which I said I should be very willing to have it go to the Committee on Finance if it could be understood that they should be at liberty to offer it as an amendment to the deficiency bill to-day, notwithstanding the rule which required it to be sent also to the Committee on Appropriations. Thereupon the Chair asked unanimous consent and declared that it had been granted. He said:

The objection under Rule 27 will be waived.

To which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] said:

Under any rule. That is, this amendment, if agreed to by the Committee on Finance, may be offered to the deficiency bill.

I then said:

Notwithstanding the rule.

The Presiding Officer then repeated it:

Notwithstanding the rule.

Then the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] asked if it was understood that the amendment was to go to the Committee on Appropriations, to which it was replied by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE:]

No, it is to go to the Committee on Finance.

Then I stated again what the objection was under the rule, and the Senator from Pennsylvania, making no objection, said:

The reason of my question was that the sub-committee on the deficiency bill are about to meet, and if there is any action to be taken by the Committee on Appropriations it should be attended to at once.

Then the Senator from West Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, asked if I had said the thing was done by consent of the Committee on Appropriations. I said no, he was mistaken in thinking so:

Mr. HOAR. My friend is mistaken. The Chair asked unanimous consent of the Senate, and that unanimous consent was given.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Unanimous consent to what?

Mr. HOAR. That this amendment, the character of which I have explained, might be referred to the Committee on Finance, and that it should be in order for them to move it as an amendment hereafter, if they see fit.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senate cannot do that.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator does not care to have the amendment go to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not know that I do; but then I do not want an arrangement made for the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia object?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I reserve all points of order. I shall not consent to an arrangement by which the amendment shall be beyond the control of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOAR. I must then stand upon my right, it being a plain desire of the whole Senate, as it seemed to me. The Chair asked if unanimous consent was given to the request, and declared that it had been given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the state of the case.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator please read the important part of his remarks which he has wholly omitted on the left hand column.

Mr. HOAR. Wait until I finish reading; I have omitted nothing here. After the Presiding Officer said: "That is the state of the case."

Mr. HOAR. It is too late now to object.

Mr. HARRIS. I have carefully reviewed what occurred yesterday.

Mr. HOAR. I have not completed the reading.

Mr. HARRIS. I raise the point of order that this question is not debatable. I have carefully examined what occurred yesterday, and I see that the Senator from West Virginia reserved the right to raise the question of order.

Mr. HOAR. Other Senators may not have as carefully reviewed perhaps as the Senator has done.

Mr. HARRIS. I have revieved it with sufficient care to be perfectly satisfied that I understand what it means, and I raise the question of order that this question is not debatable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken. The Chair thinks that the amendment is liable to the point of order clearly.

Mr. HOAR. I take an appeal. I desire to have the question submitted to the Senate whether the amendment shall now be received.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate. Shall the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont be received?

Mr. WITHERS. May I ask a question in view of the decision upon the point of order? Unless that decision be appealed from——

Mr. WHYTE. It is appealed from by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HARRIS I ask the Chair to submit the appeal rather than the question of order. I understood the Chair to decide the question of order, and from that decision there is an appeal.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did so state, but under the right which he has under the rule he will submit the question to the Senate, Shall the amendment be received?

Mr. HOAR. Upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LOGAN. I may be incorrect, but I ask whether the proper way of stating the question would not be, Shall the Chair be sustained in the decision? I myself prefer to vote in that direction.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair under the right given him by the rules submits the question to the Senate, Shall the amendment be received? having indicated his opinion that it is not in order.

Mr. LOGAN. Is not the question to be submitted to the Senate whether the Chair shall be sustained in his ruling?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not. The Chair submitted the other proposition.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is not the proper question then, Is the amendment in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The parliamentary question is, Shall the amendment be received?

Mr. MORRILL. I merely desire to say that I understand a veto message has been sent in upon the ground of the fifth section of the former bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understand the position to be taken by the Senator from Massachusetts that an agreement was made yesterday that the point of order should be waived, and upon that gound I shall vote in favor of receiving the amendment.

Mr. WITHERS. But the RECORD shows the contrary.

Mr. McMILLAN. I shall not vote upon the ground that the amendment is objectionable to the point of order.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator will allow me to read from the RECORD. The Senator from West Virginia distinctly announced:

I reserve all points of order. I shall not consent to an arrangement by which the amendment shall be beyond the control of the Committee on Appropriations.

Distinctly announcing that he reserved all points of order, and then subsequently he reiterated that he would not consent to waive any point of order but would reserve the right to make it.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Tennessee also ought to state that that was said by the Senator from West Virginia after his request for an explanation of a past transaction. The Chair had put the question distinctly and clearly to the Senate and had announced the unanimous consent. Then the Senator from West Virginia asked what had taken place, and it being discussed some time he then made his reservation of points of order. Then I said I must then stand upon my right, that the assent was given some time ago, and appealed to the Chair, and the Chair said:

That is the state of the case.

Mr. WHYTE. Probably as I brought on this difficulty yesterday I should state what the understanding was as I took it.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is in the RECORD.

Mr. WHYTE. The RECORD also states it, I know, but I will state the reason why I propose to vote against the reception of this amendment. Yesterday when the Senator from Massachusetts offered his amendment he moved that it be sent to the Committee on Appropriations. I promptly suggested that it ought to go to the Committee on Finance. That view was taken. Then the Senator from Massachusetts asked that Rule 27 be waived, which would require it to be sent afterward to the Committee on Appropriations. It was then distinctly understood that that rule would be waived provided the Finance Committee moved it as coming from that committee as an amendment to the bill. I understand that the Finance Committee does not so move it. The Senator from Vermont has admitted that there was no quorum of the Finance Committee and as a body it did not act upon the amendment at all. Therefore it is not moved by the Finance Committee, but only by a member of that committee, and the waiver does not stand. Hence I shall vote against receiving the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator from Vermont also said that he had been authorized by a majority of the committee upon the floor to move the amendment. Certainly the Senate has never insisted when that has been announced on requiring a committee to assemble in its committee-room.

Mr. GARLAND. As the occupant of the chair at that time, I beg leave to detain the Senate a few moments in order to explain my understanding of this matter. When the Senator from Massachusetts offered this as an amendment yesterday and asked consent that the point of order should not be made upon it, as the occupant of the chair then, in his language I supposed he confined it entirely to the operation of Rules 27 and 28. The language that he used has been read by himself and has been referred to also by other Senators. A colloquy then ensued. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] then said:

Unanimous consent to what?

Then the Senator from Massachusetts answered that, stating that the Senator from West Virginia would not care to have the amendment referred to the Committee on Appropriations, to which the Senator from West Virginia replied:

I do not know that I do; but then I do not want an arrangement made for the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia object?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I reserve all points of order.

Then the Senator from Massachusetts appealed to the Chair to know and stated again his impression. The Chair answered:

That is the state of the case.

That is what occurred. The Senator from Massachusetts made his point that Rules 27 and 28 would not be invoked against his amendment. That was the understanding that the Chair had:

Mr. HOAR. It is too late now to object.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. We will see when it comes up.

The Chair considered that that was clear notice to the Senate on the part of the Senator from West Virginia that he would object when the amendment came up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has no doubt about the irregularity of the amendment, but he proposes that the Senate shall place its own interpretation upon the understanding of yesterday. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire, inasmuch as this question may be misunderstood, in one moment to state my own position. I shall vote to sustain the point of order for the reason that I am opposed generally to general legislation on appropriation bills; and second, because putting the amendment on the bill is clearly out of order. Although the question is put, Shall this amendment be received? that only means, is it in order, and therefore I shall vote that it is not.

Mr. McMILLAN. I shall vote to receive the amendment on the ground that the point of order was waived.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I shall vote not so much on the point of order as on the point of honor. It was understood by me at any rate, whether it was by others or not, that the rule was waived yesterday, and that the Senator from Massachusetts would have the right to offer this amendment. On that ground I shall vote that the Senate did agree to admit it.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say that without in the least being shaken in my own understanding of what the consent was, because although I first limited my request to the twenty-seventh rule, yet immediately the Senator from Iowa said the objection should not extend under any rule, and thereupon I modified my request, and the Chair announced the consent as having been given. But in order to save any question if gentlemen say now that they did not conceive that they were bound by this consent, I make the request to my honorable friend from Vermont to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that if the other side of the Chamber are not anxious to have this amendment placed on the deficiency bill I am not. I am by no means convinced that a 3 per cent. loan can be negotiated under any circumstances, and doubt very much whether now a 3½ per cent. loan could be as readily carried in the market as a 3 per cent. loan could have been three months ago. Therefore, by permission, I withdraw the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont asks leave to withdraw his amendment. The yeas and nays having been ordered consent is required. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WITHERS. On the part of the Committee on the District of Columbia and of some members of the Committee on Appropriations, I move a necessary amendment to the deficiency bill, which was omitted from the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. After line 601, of section 1, I move to insert:

For salary of the warden of the jail for the District of Columbia for the next fiscal year, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read, to come in after line 545.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 545 it is proposed to insert:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to fulfill the treaty stipulations relative to the payment of annuities or other things with the Chippewas of Lake Superior and Mississippi, as provided in article 9 of the treaty of September 30, 1854, $84,438.95, being the total balances of appropriations under treaties with said Indians, and covered into the Treasury between the years 1843 and 1878, inclusive: Provided, That an agreement can be made with the Indians that that amount is received in lieu of all arrearages on account of former treaties, as provided in said treaty: And provided further, That the Indians consent to have this money deposited in the Treasury to draw interest at 5 per cent. and to receive annually the interest in such manner and amounts as the Secretary of the Interior may think proper in the interests of their civilization.

For this amount, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to fulfill treaty stipulations, relative to the payment of annuities with the Chippewas of Lake Superior, Indians of the La Pointe agency, in the State of Wisconsin, and the Chippewas of Mississippi, and Indians of the White Earth agency, in the State of Minnesota, $34,165.80, being the aggregate difference between the coin value of payments made in currency during the years 1863 and 1864, at the dates of Treasury warrants and the amounts due in coin by treaty stipulations, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, from date of said Treasury warrants to February 6, 1881: Provided, That said sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of said Indians in aiding them in their efforts to become self-sustaining.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I submit the first paragraph as a separate amendment. I desire the question to be taken first on the amendment relating to the Chippewas of Lake Superior and Mississippi.

Mr. WALLACE. This amendment was before the Committee on Appropriations, considered, and rejected. It is, as the Senate will see, for moneys accruing from 1843 to 1878. We regard it as a matter that ought to have the approval of a committee and come in the form of a bill rather than go upon the deficiency bill. I trust the Senate will sustain the committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This is an amendment proposed by the Interior Department in a communication sent to the Committee on Appropriations. The amount embraced in this item was found to be due to the Lake Superior and Mississippi Chippewas by a committee appointed by the House of Representatives in 1878 to investigate the subject. That committee made their investigation and the result of it is that this amount is found to be unpaid and due to these Indians; and it has been covered into the Treasury of the United States and remains there to-day. The acting commissioner of Indian Affairs accompanies this communication with a letter submitted in connection with a letter also from the Secretary of the Interior, both of which I ask may be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 11, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a draft of an amendment presented by the Office of Indian Affairs, which it is desired may be attached to either the sundry civil or some deficiency appropriation bill now pending before Congress.

A copy of the letter of the Indian Office, presenting the amendment, which provides for the appropriation of the sums therein stated as due to the Chippewas of Lake Superior and the Mississippi, in accordance with the findings of a commission appointed under a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 11th of March, 1878, is also herewith and fully explains the action taken and required.

The early and favorable attention and action of Congress is respectfully recommended in the matter of the proposed legislation.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

C. SCHURZ,
Secretary.

Hon. HENRY G. DAVIS,
Chairman Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask that the letter of the Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs be read; and I hope the Senator having charge of the bill will give attention to these letters.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, February 9, 1881.

SIR: On the 11th day of March, 1878, the following resolution passed the House of Representatives and was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish the Committee on Indian Affairs of this House an itemized statement of account with the Chippewas of Lake Superior and Mississippi, under the ninth article of the treaty made with those Indians the 30th of September, 1854."

Hons. George M. Beebe and J. H. Stewart were appointed by the chairman to investigate these matters, and Agent J. L. Mahan was detailed by this office to assist in this investigation.

Their labors under this resolution were long, tedious, and exhaustive, requiring an examination of the books of several Departments.

It appears from their investigation that there had been covered into the Treasury unexpended balances of appropriations for these Indians from 1843 to 1878 inclusive, the sum of $84,438 95. The committee also inquired into another matter, which has been a source of considerable anxiety to the Indians.

It appeared from an examination of their treaty that they were entitled to receive a portion of their annuity in coin or specie. On making an examination of the requisitions and warrants in the Treasury and Indian Office, they found that during the years 1863 and 1864 these Indians were compelled, under their protest, to receive currency. A statement was prepared showing the difference between coin and currency value of the several payments, which amounted in the aggregate to $32,298.77, a full account of which, with the report of said committee, will be found in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, (Volume 3, part 3, and appendix, Forty-fifth Congress, third session.) The above aggregate of $32,298.77 included interest upon the sum due, at 5 per cent. per annum up to February 6, 1879, to which has been added interest at the same rate, to February 6, 1881, namely, $1,867.03, thus making the total amount now due $34,165.80.

Owing to the near approach of the end of the session, and press of business, the sub-committee was unable to secure any action upon its report.

The amounts found due to the said Indians, as reported by the committee, are correct, and are justly due under treaty stipulations; and with a view to securing legislation in their behalf during the present session, I have caused a draught of an amendment to be prepared covering the amounts hereinbefore named, and transmit the same herewith, with the recommendation that it be transmitted to Congress with your approval, with the request that it be attached as an amendment to some one of the sundry civil or deficiency appropriation bills yet to be acted upon by the present Congress.

Very respectfully,

E. M. MARBLE,
Acting Commissioner.

Honorable SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The only portion of this claim embraced within the present amendment is that found to be due under the treaties and covered into the Treasury of the United States. As to the merits of this claim it seems to me there can be no doubt. The authorities of the United States, the committee appointed by the House of Representatives, have made this laborious investigation. They have ascertained that this amount is due to these Indians under treaties which have been made with them by the Government of the United States; and that the amounts thus due and unpaid have been covered into the Treasury of the United States and remain there to-day. The committee recommend the payment of this amount. The Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs admits the truth of the claim, the correctness of the report, and recommends that the amount be paid. The Secretary of the Interior, in transmitting that communication to Congress, indorses the statement of the Commissioner and recommends the payment of this claim.

Very much has been said about the care which this Government takes of the Indian tribes, and efforts have been made at the present and last session to enact legislation which will tend to the interests and welfare of the Indians; but it is just by such conduct as this on the part of the Government of the United States that the condition of Indian affairs which at present exists is brought about. These people are dealing with a Government upon whose honor they rely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator continuing?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hope the Senator will be allowed to proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection and the Senator from Minnesota will proceed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I shall detain the Senate only by a very few remarks.

Mr. WALLACE. We shall not get through the bill if we go on in this way, I beg to inform the Senator.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Indian tribes rely upon the honor of the Government. They rely upon the promises the Government has made to them. The fulfillment of the treaties which have been enacted between the Government and these tribes is regarded on their part as being due to them, and every breach of these treaties only brings into contempt the Government of the United States with these people. They do not know why promises are not fulfilled. They do not understand why treaty obligations are not carried out. They only know that the Government makes to them promises which they do not fulfill, and that has been the occasion of the disturbances which have existed upon the part of the Indian tribes all through the country. They rely upon a promise when it is made to them.

The Committee on Appropriations could not have considered the merits of this claim. They could not have come to any other conclusion than the conclusion arrived at by the Interior Department, if they had had time to examine this amendment. I am satisfied their action can only be attributed to the fact that the committee have not had time to give the examination to this amendment which they should have done. I know the great labors resting upon that committee. I know that it is calling upon them to endure a great deal to spend the night in labor, but the fact that this claim is one of a meritorious character should induce them to withdraw any objection to it and permit the Senate to pass it, as I hope they will.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN.]

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—15.

Baldwin,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Rollins,
Blair,	Hamlin,	Kirkwood,	Saunders,
Bruce,	Hill of Colorado,	McMillan,	Teller.
Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Platt,

NAYS—30.

Bailey,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Thurman,
Bayard,	Harris,	McDonald,	Vance,
Booth,	Hereford,	McPherson,	Vest,
Butler,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,	Walker,
Call,	Johnston,	Paddock,	Wallace,
Coke,	Jonas,	Pugh,	Williams.
Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Farley,	Kernan,	Slater,

ABSENT—30.

Allison,	Conkling,	Hoar,	Saulsbury,
Anthony,	Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Beck,	Davis of W. Va.,	Logan,	Voorhees,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Morgan,	Whyte,
Brown,	Ferry,	Morrill,	Windom,
Burnside,	Garland,	Pendleton,	Withers.
Cameron of Wis.,	Groome,	Plumb,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Randolph,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire to offer an amendment. At the end of line 366, I move to insert:

For expenditures under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for unveiling the statue erected commemorative of Admiral Farragut, $5,000, to be immediately available.

In this connection I desire to say that an appropriation of $7,500 was asked for by the Secretary of the Navy; and the same appropriation was recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is well known to every member of the Senate that the statue has now been completed and that the pedestal has been completed. On the 23d day of April it is expected that the ceremony of unveiling the statue will take place. The appropriateness of this appropriation of money seems to me to be so very plain that no Senator will object to it.

Very strangely, the Committee on Appropriations have neglected to recommend the appropriation. I think they have overlooked it; it must have escaped their notice. That certainly must have been the reason. I can ascribe no other reason for its omission. No one upon that committee would for a moment hesitate to appropriate the necessary amount of money for a proper ceremonial attending upon the unveiling of the statue of Admiral Farragut, a man so distinguished as he. Therefore I will do the committee the justice to say that they must have overlooked the request both of the Secretary of the Navy and of the Committee on Naval Affairs. If they have not done so, I know the Senate will not refuse to grant the appropriation.

Mr. WALLACE. The committee did consider this item appropriating $5,000 for the unveiling of the statue of Farragut, or ceremonies connected therewith. The statue is completed, and we thought it could be unveiled for a good deal less money, perhaps for part of the money now in the custody of the Navy Department. Therefore we rejected the amendment. We think the amendment ought not to go on the bill, and I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator withdraw his motion for a moment?

Mr. WALLACE. I must insist on it.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will not take any time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to appeal to my friend from Pennsylvania to withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. WALLACE. I will withdraw it temporarily.

Mr. THURMAN. I am strongly inclined to vote for any amendment that will do honor to Admiral Farragut, but I want my friend from New Jersey to tell me how the money is to be expended. For what purpose is it to be expended? I wish very much to do honor to the man. Anything that I can do to pay honor to the memory of a man so distinguished as Admiral Farragut, a very short personal acquaintance with whom has made me esteem him as I do, (a man with a big heart and broad views, a generous man free from all malice or sectionalism, a great man,) I am willing to vote for; but I do want to know of my friend how this money is to be expended? In what way? If I can conceive of anything in the world to support the amendment I will support it.

Mr. McPHERSON. I cannot answer the Senator from Ohio in regard to the ceremonial. I only know that this appropriation is asked for by the Navy Department. I also know that the ceremonial attendant upon the unveiling of the statue of General Thomas cost something like $25,000. I think an appropriation of $25,000 was made by Congress for that purpose.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from New Jersey permit me to make a suggestion? I did not hear any explanation asked when we so liberally voted a very large sum of money for unveiling the statue at Yorktown.

Mr. EATON. It was not necessary; the whole country was interested in it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. And the whole country is interested in this ceremonial.

Mr. WALLACE. I must insist on my motion. I renew the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida is on the floor just now.

Mr. WALLACE. Then I propose to do it when I have the opportunity.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Thirty thousand dollars was voted, I believe, for the Yorktown ceremonial. The first proposition made to the Naval Committee was larger than this. I suggested that $5,000 would be a reasonable sum, and I am willing to vote it. I cannot go into every little item, and I do not suppose the Senator from New Jersey can.

Mr. McPHERSON. I know nothing about the particulars.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not think such an inquiry ought to be directed to a Senator.

Mr. VOORHEES. I can answer the inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield?

Mr. McPHERSON. I yield to everybody.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand that the Senator yields the floor?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Admiral of the Navy, Admiral Porter, has taken personal charge of the ceremonies for the unveiling of the Farragut statue and in connection with the Navy Department, and they design to make it an occasion worthy of the fame of that great hero. I speak of my personal knowledge now of their purposes. This small and trifling appropriation is asked in order to make a becoming display upon that occasion. The event is fixed for the 23d day of April, a day illustrious in the life of Admiral Farragut. It is the intention of the Navy Department and of the old naval officers who were the companions-in-arms and the companions in glory of Farragut, to make it a memorable affair.

I think it is a small request that they make, and it is a very small matter to stop and cavil one second of time about it, when the Navy Department and the old officers of the Navy, with Admiral Porter at their head, ask for the small sum of $5,000 upon the occasion of displaying to the world the statue of this man who will be as immortal in the history of the Navy of this country as Nelson is in the history of the Navy of England.

Mr. WALLACE. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. THURMAN. I beg the Senator to withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. WALLACE. This bill will be lost, unless we get it through before five o'clock.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Pennsylvania is taking more time than anybody else.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw the motion to lay on the table?

Mr. WALLACE. I must yield to my friend from Ohio for a moment.

Mr. THURMAN. The remarks of the Senator from Indiana remind me of what I heard, but which I had forgotten for the moment, that it is the wish of those who have in charge the unveiling of this statue to bring to Washington some of the naval people who have been distinguished under the command of Admiral Farragut, and that some such sum as this will be necessary for their transportation to Washington and for their return to their proper stations. I shall vote for the amendment with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, Congress has decreed a statue to a great admiral, and now when we are prepared to unveil it, it seems to me it would be a shabby thing to refuse this modest appropriation to perform the ceremony in a decorous manner. That is all I have to say.

Mr. WALLACE. I beg to say in behalf of the Committee on Appropriations that it thinks we are spending too much money in sprees, and I think it does not belong to us to do this with the money of the tax-payers. Our duty lies in a different direction. It does seem to me that this session of Congress is to be distinguished for the expenditure of the people's money in just this direction. I trust the committee will be sustained in this small matter. I renew my motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope the Senator will not make a stand on this matter of $5,000 by which it is proposed to do honor to a man like Admiral Farragut.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 19, noes 28.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. McPHERSON.]

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 7255) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3292) granting a pension to Sally M. Buchanan, widow of General Robert C. Buchanan, United States Army.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 7255) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census was read twice by its title.

Mr. HARRIS. I see that the chairman of the Committee on Census is present. I was going to ask the reference of the bill to that Committee.

Mr. PENDLETON. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Select Committee to make provision for taking the Tenth Census.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Can we have that bill printed?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. All bills are printed under the rule.

Mr. PENDLETON. It will be printed if there is time.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Claims the bill (H. R. No. 5521) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and acts amendatory thereof, without amendment. I want it to lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table subject to the call of the Senator.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes.

Mr. BAILEY. By direction of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads I offer an amendment, and on it I wish to say a word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert as an additional section:

SEC. —. That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to readjust the salaries of all postmasters of the third, fourth, and fifth classes, under the classification provided for in the act of July 1, 1864, whose salaries have not heretofore been readjusted under the terms of section 8 of the act of June 12, 1866, who made direct official application or sworn returns of receipts and business for readjustment of salary to the Postmaster-General, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, or the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, such readjustments to be made in accordance with the mode presented in section 8 of the act of June 12, 1866, and to date from the beginning of the quarter succeeding that in which such application or sworn returns of receipts and business were made; and any sums which may be ascertained to be due shall be reported to the next Congress by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. WALLACE. I make the point of order on the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is clearly out of order.

Mr. BAILEY. May I say one word upon the question of order? The amendment provides no new legislation whatever. Under the act of 1866 a certain compensation was due to postmasters of certain classes, and it is due to-day, and the Government of the United States owes it to these postmasters.

This is simply a direction to the Postmaster-General to ascertain and report to the next Congress what is due to these persons. There is no new legislation in it whatever. It is simply a direction upon the part of the Congress of the United States to the Postmaster-General to make a report of the facts in order that Congress itself may be able to determine what sums are due and whether they shall be paid. I make the report by direction of the Post-Office Committee. Two years ago this identical amendment was offered by direction of the same committee, and it was rejected by the House. A question of order was then made, and the Chair and the Senate decided it to be in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the amendment is clearly liable to the point of order. It provides for a readjustment of the salaries of postmasters.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to say one word more. The act of 1866 required this to be done by the Postmaster-General. In respect to nine-tenths of the post-offices he performed the duty according to the act of 1866. In respect to some of the post-offices and postmasters he did not perform that duty. The act of 1866 required this readjustment to be made. The Postmaster-General has failed in the discharge of this duty with respect to a number of post-offices and postmasters in the country, and this amendment simply requires him to perform a duty that was by law demanded of him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Tennessee desires, the Chair will submit the question to the Senate. The Chair is clearly of opinion that the amendment is out of order. The force of the former law was clearly spent, and this is the re-enactment of a new law for the adjustment of the salaries.

Mr. BAILEY. It is a matter of no interest to me. It concerns the postmasters in the northwestern part of the country, who are represented here to-day by the Senators from Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, Missouri, Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska, and if they choose to let this measure of justice to their constituents fail, I have nothing to say in regard to it.

Mr. McMILLAN. If there is nothing now before the Senate, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of line 330:

For reimbursing to Captain E. C. Bowen the expenses incurred by him in defending a civil suit brought against him by William Stuart, a discharged soldier, in Yankton County court, in Yankton, Dakota, $711.77.

Mr. McMILLAN. This amendment was before the Committee on Appropriations and the item was not allowed. The reason for that, as I have been informed, is that there was no evidence before the committee in regard to the claim except the petition of Captain Bowen, who desires this reimbursement of money. In that the committee was mistaken. There was a letter from the War Department, which I have in my hand. I obtained it in the committee-room, and it was overlooked by the committee. The concluding sentence of the letter reads:

The facts are fully set forth in the petition, and the circumstances of the case seeming to justify favorable action, the Secretary of War directs me to recommend that the relief asked for be granted.

H. T. CROSBY, Chief Clerk.

Mr. WALLACE. If the Senator will allow that communication to go into the RECORD, the amendment may go on the bill so far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. McMILLAN. Very well.

The papers submitted are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, February 23, 1881.

The chief clerk of the War Department, in the absence of the Secretary of War, has the honor to transmit to the House of Representatives, for the consideration of the Committee on Appropriations, copy of a petition from Captain E. C. Bowen, United States Army, retired, for reimbursement of expenses incurred in defending a civil suit brought against him by William Stuart, a discharged soldier, in the Yankton County court, at Yankton, Dakota, amounting to $711.77.

The facts are fully set forth in the petition, and the circumstances of the case seeming to justify favorable action, the Secretary of War directs me to recommend that the relief asked for be granted.

H. T. CROSBY, Chief Clerk.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 12, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to request to be reimbursed, on account of expenses incurred by me in defending a civil suit brought against me by William Stuart, a discharged soldier, in the Yankton County court, at Yankton, Dakota.

The facts are as follows: In December, 1877, my company, I, Eleventh Infantry, with Companies E and K, same regiment, was on scouting duty in pursuit of hostile Indians in the Black Hills, pursuant to orders from headquarters Department of Dakota.

One morning just before breaking camp, William Stuart, then a private of my company, was disrespectful, insubordinate, and insulting to me, his company commander, and after I had placed him under guard for this and other bad conduct, he continued his loud and abusive talk, calling me the vilest names, and threatening to shoot me as soon as he could get his hands on a musket, which would be before the scout was over. (His language.)

To stop such an exhibition as this before my company and others present, and to maintain proper discipline and the dignity of the service, I, acting upon my best judgment and in my capacity as an officer of the Government, determined that this man should be separated from the other men, rendered powerless to execute his threats, and, as far as possible, isolated, that he might have opportunity to reflect upon his conduct, and not contaminate others.

To do this I directed that his hands be tied front of his body, and that he should thus walk behind a wagon during the march of that day. This was done. The day in question was, for the season, mild and pleasant. The march was only fourteen miles. The command halted ten minutes each hour, and an hour at noon for lunch, &c. The man was frequently seen with his hands loose riding on the feed-box of the wagon, as I afterward learned. Thus it will be seen that my action entailed no hardship nor injury, and was not punishment, but rather a relief, from carrying a musket and accouterments and marching with the other soldiers. The officer in command, Major Bartlett, Eleventh Infantry, passed by about the time Stuart got in position behind the wagon, inquired into the circumstances, and afterward approved my action. The other officers of the command knew all the circumstances and the necessity for my action, and often spoke of my forbearance under such strong provocation.

The judge before whom the case was tried, a civilian, frequently remarked during the progress of the trial upon my mild conduct in the matter. These are all the essential facts. They can, if necessary, be readily established at any time.

This man was afterward discharged the service for fraudulent enlistment; went to Yankton, and there threatened to go for me, as he expressed it, when I passed through Yankton. It seems he found there some lawyers, so-called, who, for a share of what they could rob from me, instituted this suit. When I passed through Yankton they got service on me, and thus obliged me to defend or a judgment would be rendered in default. I applied for counsel at the time. The request was denied. Why, I cannot understand, except that the facts were not understood. The suit was tried last February, and a verdict rendered in my favor. The expenses were about seven hundred dollars. I have all the items and vouchers, which I will submit, if my claim is allowed.

I wish this application to be as brief as the circumstances will allow, and shall therefore make no argument nor statement as to the usages and custom of the service, its common law, nor as to the necessity for my action or similar action under like circumstances. These are all far better understood by my superior officers through whose hands this paper will pass.

For the same reason I will not refer to the many cases wherein action similar to mine is necessary, in fact unavoidable; nor to the many cases where civil suits and criminal suits have been brought against officers, wherein counsel and expenses were allowed by the Government under paragraph 1461 Revised Army Regulations.

Two cases now occur to me: the prosecution of Captain Lincoln, Tenth Infantry, for homicide, in Texas, and a civil suit for damages, Samuel Smith & Co., of New York, vs. General Butler, for seizing $50,000 in gold in New Orleans, (Vide opinion of the then Judge-Advocate General, J. Holt, on this case, which covers the whole ground.)

There is a question in connection with this case which, in my humble judgment, should be settled for the welfare of the Army. It is the question of jurisdiction of civil courts in my case and similar ones purely military. It will be recollected that in this case we were in the Indian country and in pursuit of hostile Indians, or in a state of war.

My address is No. 1216 F street.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. C. BOWEN,
Captain United States Army, retired.

To the ADJUTANT-GENERAL OF THE ARMY,
Washington, D. C.

E. C. BOWEN,
Captain United States Army, retired.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLATER. After line 443 I move to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to audit and allow the claim of William L. White for actual services performed by him as a clerk in the land office at Oregon City, under contract with the register and receiver thereof, at such reasonable rate for said service as to said Secretary shall be deemed reasonable, and to pay the same out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. WALLACE. That was before our committee, and the claim ought not to be allowed. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I offer the following amendment, to come in on page 15, after line 354:

To pay Dr. Emil Bessels for articles lost on board the Polaris, $1,378.50; for articles lost on board the Saranac, $1,022.50; to reimburse him for payments made by him in the preparation of the History of the Polaris Expedition, $3,632.70; for salary from August 13, 1876, to March 1, 1880, $4,200; in all, $10,233.70.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COKE. I am authorized by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer the following amendment, to come in on page 42, after line 197:

For traveling and other expenses of Indian inspectors, $1,000.

Mr. WALLACE. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. LOGAN. If there are no other amendments from the Committee on Appropriations, I desire to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the amendment I gave notice I intended to offer on page 6.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to reserve the amendment on page 17, beginning at line 386, for a separate vote. It is:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay Richard Joseph, disbursing clerk, the sum of $1,000, &c.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The other amendments will be considered as concurred in. The question is on the amendment which has been reserved, which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, after line 385, inserted the following:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay Richard Joseph, disbursing clerk, the sum of $1,000, for his services in connection with the disbursement of the census fund, payable from the appropriations for the tenth census heretofore made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate concur in this amendment?

Mr. TELLER. This is in violation of the plain provisions of the United States statutes, which provide that no extra compensation shall be paid to public officers. It is a provision for $1,000 additional compensation. There were before the Committee on Appropriations a great many honest claims, which were presented to them for the payment of debts due to individuals, which were properly deficiencies; and yet that committee, although some of these claims were recommended in some instances by the Secretary of the Interior, by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, by a committee of this Senate, and by three or four special committees which have been raised for the purpose of looking into them, have seen fit to ignore them all, and the committee come here and propose, in direct violation of a statute, to pay for services rendered for which the statute has already provided an ample and sufficient compensation.

Mr. PLUMB. This occurs to me to be a very singular principle, that because we devolve some duties on an officer, which are not already provided for in the law under which he is employed, we should give him additional compensation. In this bill and in all the other appropriation bills which have passed additional duties have been devolved on the Secretary of the Treasury and a multitude of other officers, and we are now laying the groundwork, by this amendment, for them to come to Congress hereafter and ask that they be paid extra compensation.

This is for services already rendered, services which this party was entirely competent to render in the hours he was required to labor. It did not involve any extra labor on his part; it did not involve anything he could not readily do. He is, I have no doubt, a competent person, but he had ample time, not only to do his other duties but ample time to do this and besides that he has ample time to attend all the social observances of this very social city. It seems to me it is the wrong place to begin.

Mr. WALLACE. The committee have no feeling on this subject. The gentleman named and the Superintendent of the Census came before us and explained to us the large amount of this duty that was thrown upon him without additional pay. He handled some $3,000,000 of the census fund. It was only proposed to give him $500 a year for two years, making $1,000, which the committee put on. The Senate can do as they please about the amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. Disbursing this money involved no additional responsibility, because he was not required to give bond. It added nothing more than if we should increase the expenditures of the Indian Bureau, of which he is the disbursing officer. This is a gratuity. As the Senator from Colorado has said, there were claims before the committee which the committee refused to place on this bill. I am not complaining now of the action of the committee, but I call attention to the discrimination made. Here are men dying without their claims, for which they have asked recognition for years, being paid. Here is something which does not rise to the dignity of a claim. It is in violation of law. This person has no claim either in law or justice; but simply because it is a gratuity, it is in order; while a claim for supplies furnished, about which there is no question whatever, is subject to the point of order, and cannot be inserted in this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which has been read.

The amendment was not concurred in.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator who has charge of the bill, to line 126, on page 6. I desire to offer an amendment to strike out the word "ten" and insert "twenty;" so as to make the clause read:

For heating, hoisting, and ventilating apparatus, and repairs of the same, for public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, $20,000.

The Senator will observe, by examining the estimates, that the lowest estimate is $25,000 for that purpose, and only $10,000 has been allowed. As a matter of course, the amounts estimated for ought to be in the bill, unless they are fraudulently estimated, as this is a deficiency bill. I only ask to increase it to $20,000. That was the proposition in the House.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator is right.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty" in line 126.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. In line 129, on the same page, the Senator will observe that the appropriation in this bill is $20,000 when the estimate is $50,000.

Mr. WALLACE. We have already amended that so as to give the conferees jurisdiction. The House would not consent to increase it to what was estimated for it. We have increased the amount from $20,000 to $25,000, and we have also increased the amount in the succeeding clause.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will remember that originally the estimate was for $50,000 for the deficiency in that line, and I know from information which I have in reference to the custom-house in my own city that there is as much money required in that one building to make up the deficiency as is given in this bill; and the estimate certainly should have been complied with by the Appropriations Committee in making the appropriations in the House. Of course I find no fault, except that if it is left to a conference committee I fear it may not be put in, it may be neglected, it may be overlooked, and we might just as well put it in here, because it is a proper thing to be done. I move to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty," in line 129; so as to make the clause read:

Furniture and repairs of furniture, and carpets, for all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, $50,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I offer an amendment to come in after line 356, and I hope the member of the committee having the bill in charge will not object to the amendment:

For payment to William Matthewson, of Kansas, the balance of amount due him for flour delivered to the Indian service at Fort Sill, Indian Territory, in the year 1874, as passed and allowed by the Indian Bureau, $2,954.

I desire to state briefly this case. In 1874 this man was a contractor for furnishing supplies to the military at Fort Sill. Arriving at that point with a cargo of flour to fill that contract, he was approached by the agent of the Indians at that point and requested to sell his flour to the agent, because that agency was out of supplies. With the consent of the quartermaster, or commissary, to whom he was to deliver the flour, he sold the flour to the Indian Bureau at the same price at which he should have delivered it to the military authorities. He was paid on that flour about six hundred dollars; the remainder of it he has never had from that day to this. He has been kept out of his money all this time. The Secretary of the Interior sends here a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, stating that this account is correct and should be paid. I have also here a letter from the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, who passes on claims of this kind, reciting at length the facts and stating that the claim is just and that the amount due is the sum stated in the amendment. I think that this is one of those claims which should be properly attached to a deficiency bill, being a deficiency for the Indian service for the year 1874.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Mr. WALLACE. I move that the Senate take a recess until eight o'clock.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move to amend the motion by saying "half past eight."

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion. I want to act on a motion to reconsider a bill already passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator yield to me for a resolution I wish to offer?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to take a recess until half past eight o'clock.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion as amended.

The motion as amended was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate takes a recess until half past eight o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past eight o'clock p. m.

JAMES H. REEVE.

Mr. VOORHEES. Some time ago the bill (H. R. No. 2180) granting an increase of pension to James H. Reeve passed the Senate, and a motion was made to reconsider by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] on behalf of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS.] I move to lay that motion on the table. I do it for the purpose of saving this bill, which now has passed both branches of Congress. It passed the Senate in the Forty-fifth Congress; it has passed the Senate twice in precisely the same words, and the House once.

I do not know whether it is necessary to enter into an explanation of this bill. I know the Senator from Virginia, in the kindness of his heart, does not want to antagonize this bill of itself, while desiring to do his duty exactly as he conceives it to be on the part of the Committee on Pensions. I will state, however, by way of explanation of this bill, that in the Forty-fifth Congress it passed granting an increase to Major Reeve of $4 per month and granting the increase from the date of his original certificate in 1865, and on this ground: he lost his leg at Fort Fisher; it was amputated below the knee. There is a provision of law by which a person who can wear an artificial limb is entitled to $20 per month for the loss of his limb. When he cannot wear an artificial limb he is entitled to $24 per month. While this man's leg was amputated below the knee, yet it was ascertained that he could not wear an artificial leg. He underwent a second amputation for the purpose of enabling him to wear an artificial leg.

Mr. EATON. My friend from Indiana will pardon me for one moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. EATON. One moment. I simply desire to say that the unfinished business is the Japanese idemnity bill, and I desire to take that bill up and then I have no desire to interfere——

Mr. VOORHEES. I will help the Senator from Connecticut to take up the bill to indemnify the Japanese as soon as I indemnify this one-legged soldier who had his leg cut off three times.

Mr. EATON. I ask for the right——

Mr. VOORHEES. I will help the Senator to get his right; but I am on the floor. I have waited five weeks to get up this motion which was made to reconsider a bill that gives a soldier a slight increase of $4 per month who lost his leg at Fort Fisher by one amputation and a second amputation he underwent, the evidence of which I have in my hand, to qualify him to wear an artificial leg, and failing in that he underwent a third surgical operation equal to an amputation to qualify him to wear this artificial limb, and failing to do it, carrying himself on his crutches, the House sent a bill here granting him this increase of pension and rating him correctly from the date of his original pension. It passed this body and a motion to reconsider was made.

I have waited until the last day of the session to make a motion to lay that motion to reconsider upon the table, and I want it now considered. While I have the greatest possible respect for the Japanese and the greatest possible respect for the Senator from Connecticut—he knows that I agree with him on that question—yet a one-legged soldier who has suffered the agonies of death three times over has my respect even above the Japanese, and as I have the floor I desire this motion disposed of.

Mr. EATON. Well, Mr. President, when I call for the regular order——

Mr. VOORHEES. Well, Mr. President, when I yield the floor at the dictation of the Senator from Connecticut he will have his right.

Mr. EATON. I call for the regular order.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am on the floor. If the Senator from Connecticut claims the right to take me off the floor, I do not recognize it.

Mr. EATON. I call for the regular order.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am on the floor, and have been recognized by the Chair, and I make the motion to lay this motion to reconsider on the table. I have a right to do that at any time. It is in order at any time.

Mr. WITHERS. I would ask whether the bill has been taken up.

Mr. VOORHEES. There is no question of taking the bill up. The bill has passed both branches of Congress, and a motion was made to reconsider, and I make the motion to lay that motion on the table, after having waited for the last three weeks.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. VOORHEES. I do.

Mr. WITHERS. I rise to make an inquiry as to the parliamentary status of the question. As I understand it, a motion to reconsider a bill on the Calendar was entered, and is pending before the Senate. Can the Senator make a motion to lay that on the table? I submit that the bill has to be taken up first.

Mr. VOORHEES. How can it when the bill has passed?

Mr. THURMAN. I want to say a word. The Senator from Connecticut had a perfect right to demand the regular order, and then he was perfectly willing to yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. Neither the Senator from Connecticut nor anybody else, as I conceive, has the right to rise while I have the floor, recognized by the Chair, and take me off the floor for any purpose.

Mr. THURMAN. He has a perfect right, whether the Senator is on his feet or not, to call for the regular order.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then I have some matters to learn, and I shall learn them from experience, and not by the dictation of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The suggestion of the Senator from Virginia is correct. It is necessary for the Senator from Indiana to move first to take the bill up, and then the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider will be in order.

Mr. VOORHEES. I make that motion. If the Senator from Virginia is correct, the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Connecticut are not correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that his interpretation of the rule is that the recess was taken to consider at the evening session, under the rule adopted some ten or twelve days ago, the House bills on the Calendar favorably reported. Before they were called the Senator from Indiana obtained the floor to make the motion which he now makes. That being disposed of, at the call of the Senator from Connecticut the Chair will lay the regular order before the Senate. Now the Senator from Indiana moves——

Mr. EATON. I bow, of course, to the decision of the Chair; but the Vice-President said I was entitled to the floor the moment after the recess whenever we came together. I intended to yield to my friend from Indiana, and so said to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the Chair understood.

Mr. EATON. All I desired was to get my bill before the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am willing the Senator shall get it before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Indiana now is to proceed to the consideration of the Reeve pension bill with a view of making a motion to table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion to take up was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (H. R. No. 2180) granting an increase of pension to James H. Reeve is before the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS. I want simply to state that I do not think it is fair and scarcely in accordance with that high courtesy which always characterizes the Senator from Indiana to move to lay this motion to reconsider on the table without giving any opportunity whatever to the Committee on Pensions who reported the bill to make any explanation of its status. However, I submit to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish to say, as a parting word of kindness to the Senator from Virginia, that nothing is more impossible in the world than that I should do a discourtesy toward him. It was simply a method I adopted to dispose of the question as speedily as possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia can be heard by unanimous consent, if he desires.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask, then, unanimous consent of the Senate to make a statement in a few words of the exact status of this case. When the bill was passed a few weeks ago it was owing to an inad-vertence on my part, for which I take the whole responsibility. I was under an absolute misapprehension with regard to the provisions of the bill.

The true state of the case is this: this pension bill was reported from the House to the Senate and a similar bill was on the Senate Calendar. When it came before the Committee on Pensions the Senate bill was taken up by that committee upon a favorable report by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] and passed and sent to the House, granting to this gentleman a pension of $30 a month, a pension greater than that allowed by law; but they did that out of consideration of the exceptional character of his sufferings, and they were willing to recognize them by giving him a larger pension than the general law allowed. The House bill, however, granting $24 a month pension contained a provision giving arrears at that rate from the time the pension was first allowed; and as the committee of the Senate had uniformly acted upon the principle that the arrears of pension should not be made applicable to special acts, they refused to report the bill, but reported a bill granting a greater pension to date from the passage of the act. That bill has been sent to the House, and I suppose in the next half hour will become a law, pensioning him at $30 a month.

A suggestion was made to me a few weeks ago that there was a mistake in the matter and that the bill had never passed the Senate. I was surprised at it, but I inquired of the journal clerk, not about the House bill but the Senate bill, and his investigation being directed to the House bill he said that from the Journal it appeared that the bill had been referred to the Pensions Committee and never reported, and in that state of the case I gave my assent to the proposition of the Senator from Indiana to call up the bill and pass it. I stated to the Senate at the time that the bill had been favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Pensions, that it had passed this body and been sent the House but that the records did not seem to establish the fact. Within one-half hour after this bill had thus passed I heard from two parties in whose cases I had reported and received a letter from a third, claiming that we granted arrears of pension in this act and that the same provision ought to be applied in these other cases, and that was the first intimation I had that the bill which passed contained the principle of arrears. Being called away and being then on my way home in consequence of family affliction, I wrote a note to the acting chairman of the Pensions Committee requesting him to enter a motion to reconsider this bill, because the Pensions Committee has uniformly refused to grant arrears and has been as uniformly sustained by the Senate whenever the question came before them for their adjudication. That is the status of the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no motion before the Senate upon the bill, the bill is passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EATON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the Japanese indemnity-fund bill.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask consent of the Senator who has charge of the floor to report a few pension bills which have been acted on this evening favorably and to have them passed by this body. They are all House bills favorably reported. I ask that they be taken up and acted on.

Mr. EATON. Let the regular order be taken up.

Mr. WITHERS. I thought that bill was up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is the bill (S. No. 2022) in relation to the Japanese indemnity fund. By unanimous consent this bill will be informally laid aside for the purpose of receiving the reports of the Senator from Virginia.

WILLIAM W. CHURCH.

Mr. WITHERS. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions to report back favorably and without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1649) granting a pension to William W. Church, and I ask, in view of the extraordinary circumstances surrounding this last day of the session, immediate consideration for this bill and the others which I shall subsequently report.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of William W. Church, late a private in Company K of the Sixty-fifth Regiment of Infantry, Illinois Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAROLINE STIEF.

Mr. WITHERS. I report from the Committee on Pensions favorably the bill (H. R. No. 853) granting a pension to Caroline Stief, and ask for its immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of Caroline Stief, widow of Frederick Stief, late a member of the Missouri militia.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM. C. PARKER.

Mr. WITHERS. I also report favorably, from the Committee on Pensions, the bill (H. R. No. 3786) granting a pension to William C. Parker, and ask for its immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides for paying William C Parker, of West Virginia, who lost both legs by a railroad collision while transporting Government troops during the late war, under a peremptory order of General B. F. Kelley, the officer then in command of the troops in West Virginia, at the rate of $25 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES R. GORDON.

Mr. WITHERS. I am instructed by the same committee to report back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 1453) for the relief of James R. Gordon, and ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place the name of James R. Gordon, late a private in Company D of the Sixteenth Regiment of Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers, on the pension-roll.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WITHERS. There are two or three other bills to be reported by the other members of the committee of the same character.

BETSEY ELWELL.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4608) granting a pension to Betsey Elwell.

Mr. WITHERS. I report the bill called for by the Senator from Maine, and ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4608) granting a pension to Betsey Elwell. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Betsey Elwell, formerly Betsey Butler, widow of Jeremiah Elwell, a private in the Twenty-first Regiment United States Infantry, war of 1812, at the rate of $8 per month, to date from the passage of the act of March 9, 1878, "granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and their widows, and for other purposes."

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEPHEN P. BENTON.

Mr. GROOME. The Committee on Pensions instruct me to report favorably the bill granting a pension to Stephen P. Benton, and ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 5677) granting a pension to Stephen P. Benton. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Stephen Porter Benton, a soldier of the war of 1812, at the rate per month provided by the act approved March 9, 1878.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not intend to object to any of these bills, but I desire that the report shall be read accompanying the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a report in this case?

Mr. GROOME. There is a written report.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to say that as soon as the Pension Committee is through I shall insist on going to the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report in this case.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I desire to say that there is so much confusion that we cannot hear what is going on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please come to order.

Mr. LOGAN. If there is a report in any of these cases that is lengthy if the Senator who has the bill in charge will state the facts it will be sufficient. We want to know what the case is before we agree that the bill shall pass.

Mr. GROOME. I will state briefly what the facts are in this case. The rule of the Pension Office is that no soldier of the war of 1812 whose name is not borne upon the muster-rolls, who is not shown by the muster-rolls to have served for fourteen days in the service is entitled to a pension; but in view of the fact that during that war the records were kept with extreme looseness and that persons often served under other names than their own as substitutes or otherwise, they always permit proof by two comrades of the fact of service.

Mr. LOGAN. I want to know what the facts are. I know what the law is.

Mr. GROOME. I knew the Senator from Illinois was thoroughly familiar with the law, but perhaps some other Senators are not so familiar with this particular law. In this case this applicant proved by his own affidavit the fact of the service and proved by the affidavit of one comrade the fact of the service, but he is unable to do it by two; but General Ingalls, of the Army, certifies to the high character of the applicant, that he is a man of unquestioned integrity and veracity, and a councilman of the town in which the comrade lived also testifies in the strongest possible manner to the high character for truth, veracity, and integrity of the comrade who makes oath to the fact of the service.

Under these circumstances, in view of the fact that this service was rendered at such a remote period and that so many deaths have since occurred, the Pension Committee thought it was proper that the pension should be granted, and hence reported it.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to call attention to one or two pension cases not yet disposed of.

Mr. VANCE. I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina claims the floor.

Mr. VANCE. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope not.

Mr. GROOME. We can do that later.

Mr. BLAIR. There are only two pension cases to be disposed of; they will not take five minutes.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator from New Hampshire was one of those who refused to go into executive session last night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina insist on his motion?

Mr. VANCE. I do, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VANCE. I submit the motion to the sense of the Senate. Having made the motion, I will yield to no man except the Senate says so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. VANCE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bayard,	Hereford,	McPherson,	Vance,

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHN A. MCMAHON of Ohio, Mr. T. R. COBB of Indiana, and Mr. FRANK HISCOCK of New York, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 137) to create a commission for the performance of certain duties under the act of Congress providing for the erection of a monument at Yorktown and the proposed centennial celebration.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4905) to declare the true intent and meaning of "An act to reimburse the State of Kentucky for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion," approved June 8, 1872, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 688) for the relief of the sureties of Franklin Travis;

A bill (H. R. No. 1102) granting a pension to John S. Corlett;

A bill (H. R. No. 1729) for the payment of certain Indian war bonds of the State of California;

A bill (H. R. No. 2058) for the relief of Redmond Tully;

A bill (H. R. No. 2384) amendatory of and supplementary to "An act to provide for the holding of terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Fort Wayne, Indiana," approved June 18, 1878;

A bill (H. R. No. 2637) granting a pension and arrears of pension to Johanna Meehan and minor children;

A bill (H. R. No. 3132) to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 3520) to establish a port of delivery at Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana;

A bill (H. R. No. 4451) to provide for the erection of a monument at Schuylerville, New York, commemorative of the battle of Saratoga, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 5715) to vacate and close an alley in square 504, in Washington, District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 7160) for the relief of John H. Templeton; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6324) to construe an act entitled "An act to relieve the churches of the District of Columbia and to clear the title of the trustees of such property."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 688) for the relief of the sureties of Franklin Travis;

A bill (H. R. No. 1102) granting a pension to John S. Corlett;

A bill (H. R. No. 1729) for the payment of certain Indian war bonds of the State of California;

A bill (H. R. No. 2058) for the relief of Redmond Tully;

A bill (H. R. No. 2384) amendatory of and supplementary to "An act to provide for the holding of terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Fort Wayne, Indiana," approved June 18, 1878;

A bill (H. R. No. 2637) granting a pension to Johanna Meehan and minor children;

A bill (H. R. No. 3132) to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 3520) to establish a port of delivery at Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana;

A bill (H. R. No. 4451) to provide for the erection of a monument at Schuylerville, New York, commemorative of the battle of Saratoga, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 5715) to vacate and close an alley in square 504 in Washington, District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 7160) for the relief of John H. Templeton; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6324) to construe an act entitled "An act to relieve the churches and orphan asylums of the District of Columbia, and to clear the title of the trustees of such property."

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. WALLACE, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives and agree to the conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. WALLACE, Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, and Mr. BOOTH.

PETER GRATTAN.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to call up the case of Peter Grattan. It is a bill granting a pension, and was reported by the committee unanimously this morning too late to be upon the printed Calendar.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1830) granting a pension to Peter Grattan. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Peter Grattan, father of John L. Grattan, late second lieutenant of Company G, Sixth Regiment United States Infantry.

Mr. BLAIR. I can state the facts in a briefer time than would be occupied by the reading of the report. The claimant, Peter Grattan, is an old man eighty years of age, totally disabled since the year 1867. He asks a pension by reason of the death of his son in the service, upon whom he was dependent for support. He was a graduate of West Point, an only child; was shot to death by the Indians in 1854. The bill has passed the House, it has been considered by the committee of the Senate, and its passage has been unanimously recommended.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANDREW J. PENNEL.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire at this time to report from the Committee on Pensions the bill (H. R. No. 7111) restoring the name of Andrew J. Pennel to the pension-roll, and ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to restore to the pension-roll the name of Andrew J. Pennel, late of Company F, Fifty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, to be paid, on his pension certificate numbered 58722, the original amount allowed him from the date his name was dropped from said roll.

Mr. BLAIR. Perhaps I can state the facts more briefly than they are contained in the report.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYES.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back without recommendation, to go upon the Calendar, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 164) relating to the salaries of Government employés in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered at this time.

Mr. MAXEY. Now I call for the regular order.

Mr. EATON. Regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is the Japanese indemnity-fund bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOAR. What has become of the Calendar? I hope the House bills on the Calendar will be finished. There are only two or three of them, and they will be passed, as a matter of course, I think in five minutes, perhaps in two.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Japanese indemnity bill was taken up and was the unfinished business, but was laid aside informally for reports from the Pension Committee, and the Senator from Connecticut now calls for the regular order.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to offer a resolution for printing?

Mr. HARRIS. After the recess, at night, is not the regular order the consideration of the House bills on the Calendar? If the Chair will refer to the resolution under which we are proceeding, I do not think the Chair will have any difficulty in ruling on that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so held in the early part of the session, but the Senator from Connecticut stated that the Vice-President had said before the recess that this would be the unfinished business for this evening's session.

Mr. HARRIS. I understand from the Senator from Connecticut that the bill in question was laid before the Senate and was informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was going to state that in addition.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I have no further remarks to make on the question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island desires to offer a resolution, which will be read.

NAVAL REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent:

Resolved, That 500 copies of the Naval Register be printed for the use of the Senate.

JAPANESE INDEMNITY FUND.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is the bill (S. No. 2022) in relation to the Japanese indemnity fund. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] to strike out "$1,463,224," and insert "$785,000."

Mr. EATON. At this late hour in the session I do not intend to discuss this question at any length whatever. I merely want to make a statement in addition to the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations. There is now in the Department of State a fund known as the Japanese indemnity fund, amounting to sixteen or seventeen hundred thousand dollars. The original amount paid by Japan was $785,000. That amount has never been covered into the Treasury. The administration of Mr. Lincoln, the administration of Mr. Johnson, the administration of General Grant, and the administration of Mr. Hayes have never regarded this money as belonging to us by a substantial equivalent. Those are the words used by Mr. Seward when he was Secretary of State at the time this indemnity was paid into our hands.

So far as I know, there have never been two opinions on the subject that this ought to be returned. My friend from Florida [Mr. JONES] does not desire to return anything but the amount of $785,000, because he says that under the law interest is a penalty. I was not aware of that before. I supposed that interest was for the use of money, on account of that use, and not a penalty. We received that money, the Department of State put it into bonds of the United States; and it amounts now to the sum which I before stated. The Committee on Foreign Relations with a great degree of unanimity advised the Government of the United States to return to the government of Japan the amount less $248,000, and I hope the bill will pass as a matter of justice. I regard the holding of this money by the Government of the United States as the most manifest injustice that this Government could be guilty of, and I am ready to say that it cannot be justified by anybody except by somebody who justifies the raid that was formerly made from the Highlands into the Lowlands.

We got this money; it does not belong to us; it has accumulated to this sum. Let us do a gracious, generous thing, and return it to Japan. But, says my honorable friend from Florida, this was got by a convention, and it is not decent—I use his own word—to return this money to Japan without consulting our confederates; I think I use his own words. We consult Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands with regard to what the honor of the United States demands; go into a convention and permit France, Great Britain, and the Netherlands to say what our honor demands!

My friend asks me why did we take the money from and under a convention. I did not take it. The United States did not enter into the convention. It was entered into, I agree, by the representative of the United States Government. I am not talking about ratification; I am talking exactly about what I understand, that it was not entered into by the Government of the United States except as its representative abroad went into this matter; and now, forsooth, we must get down on our marrow-bones, according to my honorable friend from Florida, and go to Great Britain, go to France, and go to the Netherlands, and ask them what the honor of the United States demands! I shall not go into that place; we have been in once and once is enough; it was a place where we had no right to be in my judgment, and my friend agrees with me. I said I would not detain the Senate. It is the last day of the session. This matter, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] showed us conclusively the other night, has been passed again and again by the Senate of the United States. It has been in the hands of the present Committee on Foreign Relations for three years, and with a great degree of unanimity they ask the Congress of the United States to pass the bill that is presented by the majority of the committee, and I hope that the amendment offered by my friend from Iowa will be voted down.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations the fact whether or not a communication from the Executive or from the Secretary of State has ever been addressed to Congress on this subject?

Mr. EATON. So far as I remember, President Grant in his message advised us to return this money. That is my recollection. I have not in my hands the message. I think Mr. Hayes so advised; but I do not assert it with any confidence, though such is my impression. I know that the administration of General Grant recommended it; that I know as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I know that the present administration is in favor of it; and I have no doubt if we fail to do this act of justice that the next administration will recommend it; and therefore I am willing to call for a vote now.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the Senator from Connecticut takes his seat I desire to ask him one question. I am not sure that I do not agree with the position which he takes, that this money ought to be returned to Japan. I understand him to base his objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, on the fact that this money was wrongfully taken from Japan. Am I correct?

Mr. EATON. I think we had a right to some of this money, to indemnification.

Mr. INGALLS. Indemnification for what?

Mr. EATON. Indemnification for the losses.

Mr. INGALLS. The losses were all indemnified before this money was paid.

Mr. EATON. I do not think so, quite.

Mr. INGALLS. The losses of the owners of the Pembroke, the ship that was turned back, amounting to $10,000, were fully paid by the Emperor of Japan, and for the insult that was offered to the flag the commander of the Wyoming destroyed the vessels of the Japanese daimio. Now, I can readily understand that if this money was wrongfully taken from the Empire of Japan it ought to be returned; but if we should return any of it we should return all of it, and I am at a loss to see upon what ground the Senator from Connecticut bases his idea that we should retain of money that does not belong to us sufficient to reward our sailors for their valor in doing a wrongful act and our ships for the damage incurred in doing that wrongful act.

Mr. EATON. There are certain assumptions of my honorable friend from Kansas with which I do not agree. In the first place, I do not agree that a wrongful act was done. The act was right.

Mr. INGALLS. The taking of the money was right?

Mr. EATON. I am now talking about something else.

Mr. INGALLS. I am talking about the money; the bill talks about the money.

Mr. EATON. Not altogether. My friend was not talking about the money; he was talking about the destruction of the Japanese vessels. That was right in my judgment.

Mr. INGALLS. Then for what was this money taken?

Mr. EATON. My friend knows as well as I.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the Senator from Connecticut state what it was taken for.

Mr. EATON. I wish my friend would read the report.

Mr. INGALLS. I have read it.

Mr. EATON. That states.

Mr. INGALLS. I am at a loss to understand what it was taken for, because if the loss to our commerce had been paid to us in full; if the insult to our flag, which is not susceptible of pecuniary indemnification, was avenged; if we inflicted sufficient injury to repay that upon the Jananese ships——

Mr. EATON. So I say.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, what did we take this $785,000 for?

Mr. EATON. If my friend wants me to make a statement——

Mr. INGALLS. I would like it in as few words as the Senator from Connecticut can state, as he knows how to do, what was that $785,000 taken for?

Mr. EATON. I will say this to my friend, that there was a convention entered into, as he knows.

Mr. INGALLS. I know all about that.

Mr. EATON. I cannot start in the center of a thing. I must begin at the commencement.

Mr. INGALLS. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator desired to be brief.

Mr. EATON. Three million dollars was taken and divided between these four powers; but instead of giving us what we ought to have received for the acts of our sailors that were upon the two vessels for their heroic conduct, as a matter, I might say, of prize-money that they would have been entitled to if this had been an absolute war between Japan and the United States, we were allowed a share of this fund. I hold that we had a right to take $140,000, but the other three powers went further than this. That is the reason why I do not want to go into any such business as my friend from Florida desires to go into. The other three powers took from Japan $3,000,000, and they gave to us about one-fourth of that amount.

Mr. INGALLS. Who gave it to us?

Mr. EATON. The other three powers.

Mr. INGALLS. The other three powers?

Mr. EATON. The other three powers.

Mr. INGALLS. Why do we return it to Japan, if the other three powers gave it to us?

Mr. EATON. It came from Japan originally.

Mr. INGALLS. Not under the Senator's statement. He said this was awarded to the three other powers and they gave us $785,000.

Mr. EATON. Oh, no.

Mr. INGALLS. If that is the case, why do we give this back to Japan when the three powers gave it to us?

Mr. EATON. My friend is mistaken in supposing I said that, or else I was extremely stupid in my statement; very likely the latter. I stated that the amount of $3,000,000 was taken by the four powers and by the action of the other three we received one-fourth. If I used the term "awarded," it may not have been strictly and technically a legal term that I ought to have used, but we received from this convention, or we took—if my friend likes it better—one-fourth of it when we ought not to have taken more than $140,000 of that money, and I desire to pay it back.

Mr. INGALLS. But for what should we have taken the $140,000?

Mr. EATON. Fairly and properly under the law of war we should have taken the $140,000. We had a right to do it because of the efforts of our sailors and marines in this war, so to speak.

Mr. INGALLS. Well, Mr. President, I can understand that a highwayman who had stopped a passenger on the road and robbed him of his watch and his trinkets and his money should repent and make restitution, but I cannot understand that in making restitution he should say that he would withhold enough to compensate him for his courage and gallantry in robbing the victim.

Mr. EATON. That does not quite state it; it may to the satisfaction of my friend from Kansas. These gentlemen who do not want to pay back the whole amount of this money may place themselves exactly in the position of the highwayman that my friend from Kansas speaks of.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that if this money was wrongfully taken we must have been in some sense wrong-doers toward Japan; and this, if I can judge of the statement of the Senator from Connecticut, is exactly parallel to the case of four highwaymen who proceeded to pillage an inferior power unable to resist, and that now, being afflicted with compunction, we propose to make restitution, saving only enough to compensate us for the heroism we exerted in taking this money from Japan.

I believe that the money was wrongfully taken from Japan; that we ought to restore it; that these four powers were as you might say foot-pads on the sea; they were engaged in an unlawful enterprise against a weak and friendly power that was itself struggling with rebellious subjects; that these injuries of which we complain were not inflicted by Japan, but they were inflicted by the rebellious subjects of Japan, and they were promptly denied and discountenanced by Japan. But, sir, I cannot understand why, when we are willing to make this restitution, we should be called upon to pay interest on a sum that has lain in the Treasury as a special deposit since that time, nor am I able to understand why we should take from that sum the amount of $140,000 for the purpose of compensating the sailors and marines who were guilty of the unlawful act.

Mr. EATON. There was no unlawful act; they were not guilty of any unlawful act. Again and again have I said that the assumption of my honorable friend from Kansas does not meet with my approbation. The act was not unlawful. So far as the act was concerned it was eminently legitimate and lawful. It was the business of the Emperor of Japan to take care of his rebellious subjects, and if he failed to do so and they preyed upon the commerce of the world, then the powers of the world should take care of those rebellions.

Mr. LOGAN. The wrongful act, as I understand it, was not in making war—if we may so call it—against Japan, but it was in the Government of the United States accepting that which they were not entitled to; that is the wrongful act.

Mr. EATON. I have endeavored so to state.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wanted to suggest that the wrongful act was not in the menace of war.

Mr. EATON. Not at all.

Mr. LOGAN. But in the conduct of our Government in accepting that to which it was not entitled.

Mr. EATON. My friend from Kansas says that he would not pay back, as I understand him, anything but the amount of money that was received.

Mr. INGALLS. I would pay all of that back.

Mr. EATON. I so understand; in other words, my honorable friend from Kansas is willing to do this, and says that this Government ought to do it, that they came into possession of three-quarters of a million dollars unjustly that they ought not to have taken, that they put about three-quarters of a million dollars at interest until it amounted to $1,500,000 or $1,600,000, and then they say, we will keep the interest, Japan, and give you back the principal.

Mr. INGALLS. That money was never put at interest.

Mr. EATON. It is at interest.

Mr. INGALLS. It was a special deposit in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. EATON. It is at interest.

Mr. INGALLS. But no officer of this Government had any right to put it where it would draw interest.

Mr. EATON. That is the fact, though. They did it anyhow.

Mr. INGALLS. They put it in bonds that did draw interest, but that does not render the United States liable for interest.

Mr. EATON. Ah, there is where we differ. I am stating a fact.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me state a question of law. If the Government of the United States invested this money for Japan, why is not Japan entitled to the interest made on that money?

Mr. EATON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask the Senator from Illinois if that is the fact?

Mr. EATON. Wait a moment. I happen to have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. EATON. I am sorry I cannot agree with the morality of my good friend from Kansas. I think this money has been at interest until it has accumulated a very large sum. I desire that Japan shall have the benefit of that interest. That is my desire.

I have had this matter in hand with my brethren of the committee for three years. I regard it as eminently just. I am going out of public life forever to-morrow, but I want to go out and have it written upon my head that I helped do this justice to Japan. I desire to be mixed up with this thing that my friend says is not decent. It strikes me as eminently decent and eminently proper that we should not keep this money in our Treasury or in our State Department, which does not belong to us, and therefore I hope the Senate will vote to return it to Japan.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I desire to say but a word. If the Government of Japan is entitled to this money, which I certainly believe it is, I do not think that a great government like ours in dealing with a sister government, and a weaker one, should higgle about whether the payment of interest or the payment of money to seamen is right or wrong. If the Government of Japan through her minister determines that is right, and therefore it is put into the bill, we should not higgle about it for a moment.

Without discussing this question in all its details, we know that so far as the insult to our flag is concerned it was fully repaired by our own strong arm, as reparation is always made where an insult is given to the flag, either by an acknowledgment asking pardon of the Government or by the Government enforcing a right by its own strong arm. So far, then, as making war as we did upon this government, we had a right to do that if we desired for the purpose of avenging the wrong, if we deemed it a wrong or an insult. If we did that it was correct, but when we come to take from them money to which we have no right, the honor of this Government is called upon to make remuneration to that weaker power.

The question is not whether England, France, and the Netherlands shall repay the portion of the money they received. The question with us is, shall the Government of the United States retain in her Treasury that to which she is not entitled, and which belongs to a sister government with whom we have friendly and amicable relations, as we have with the Government of Japan.

As to the question of interest, it is not a question that should stop us in our action one moment. If we invested the money, knowing it was not ours, for whom did we invest it? Not for our own benefit, but for the benefit of the government that was entitled to it. We invested it as a trustee for that government. They are entitled to the interest on it. I would not for one moment hesitate in reference to the amount of interest when we are called upon as a nation honorably to pay back that which does not belong to us.

It was well said by the Senator from Connecticut, in response to the Senator from Florida, that this claim is not here now for the first time. It was advocated during General Grant's administration. He recommended it to Congress time and again; and I have yet to hear the first representative say that the Government of the United States is entitled to one dollar of this money. If not entitled to it, why not give it back? Why retain it? Why discuss it? Why hesitate when we are in honor bound not to retain this money for one moment longer than we can legislate it out of our hands and pay it back to those who are justly and honestly entitled to it?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I am admonished of the lateness of the session and the great pressure of business now upon this body, and I do not intend at this late hour to consume much of the valuable time of the Senate. I have already debated this matter very fully, but it is a very important bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Florida yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Not now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida declines to yield.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. There has been so much inaccuracy of statement about this matter on the part of those who ought to be familiar with all its details that I am ready to hesitate about voting for the bill at all. When I last had the floor I said that in my opinion justice required that the principal sum received from Japan ought to be returned. I am still of that opinion.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] said that this money was obtained from this weak power in the midst of our own domestic troubles, and that we used the money at a period when it was very much needed to replenish the wasted coffers of the United States. I do not understand how that can be, when I find, on looking into the public papers, that the treaty under which this money was obtained was not ratified by the Senate until 1866. It is true that the memoranda were drawn up before that time, but the treaty was not ratified until 1866, and under the provisions of it the money could not be paid until long after its ratification. This money was not paid during the period of the war. It was paid after the war terminated, although the cause of damage originated some time before. So much for the accuracy of that statement with reference to this fund.

I said the other day that I would expect the honorable Senator from Connecticut when he got the floor to point out as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations how it was that the United States was profited by this money to the extent of $1,000,000. The interest of this fund to-day is nearly one million dollars; and I should like for some member of that committee to point out to me how this Government has been enriched to that amount by the investment, by a mere figuring on the Treasury books, by a mere mathematical calculation. To whom did the Government loan this money? Does she not hold it to-day by the very same title that England, France, and Holland hold the $2,000,000 or more that they received? Did she not have a right to its possession as a depositor holding the money of another government, so appearing upon her books and deposited in her vaults?

The other day I sent a communication to the Secretary of the Treasury asking him to inform me of the number of bonds into which this money was converted and the date of the investment, having been unable to find anything in the published reports about it. I received a reply that he could not give it; that he supposed the State Department would be able to tell. I have not found any distinct statement of it of any account made of trust funds in the public papers of the Government, but I suppose it is all right.

Sir, it seems to me that to saddle this claim of $1,000,000 for interest on this Government for the use of a fund that it was entitled to by every principle of justice would be an outrage upon the American people greater than that which was committed upon the people of Japan.

Mr. EATON. We could not pay a dollar of the fund on the Senator's theory.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes, we could. We could give up the principal sum as a matter of bounty, and that is the only way that it is proposed to do it. It has been of no value to us.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Government had not used this money, it would have had to raise a like sum by taxation or by borrowing.

Mr. KERNAN. It would have had to borrow on bonds or something else.

Mr. THURMAN. To be sure.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Did not the Government have the right to use the money? Did it not have the right to it under the provisions of the treaty? Here is the treaty, and I ask the Secretary of the Senate to read the first part of it at least, to show when that transaction took place. It is very short.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The representatives of Great Britain, France, the United States, and the Netherlands, in view of the hostile acts of Mori Daizen, Prince of Nagato and Suwo, which were assuming such formidable proportions as to make it difficult for the tycoon faithfully to observe the treaties, having been obliged to send their combined forces to the strait of Simonoseki, in order to destroy the batteries erected by that daimio for the destruction of foreign vessels and the stoppage of trade; and the government of the tycoon, on whom devolved the duty of chastising this rebellious prince, being held responsible for any damage resulting to the interests of the treaty powers, as well as the expenses occasioned by the expedition:

The undersigned, representatives of treaty powers, and Sakai Hida no Kami, a member of his second council invested with plenipotentiary powers by the tycoon of Japan, animated with a desire to put an end to all reclamations concerning the acts of aggression and hostility committed by the said Mori Daizen since the first of these acts, in June, 1863, against the flags of divers treaty powers, and at the same time to regulate definitively the question of indemnities of war, of whatever kind, in respect to the allied expedition to Simonoseki, have agreed and determined upon the four articles following.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It appears from this treaty entered into between the United States and the powers here named that this sum of $3,000,000 was obtained in strict accordance with the law of nations. There is nothing clearer, I think, or better settled under the international code, than that independent States have the right to enter into conventions between each other, and such agreements form a part of the law of nations. It is what we call the perfect law, because the nations have clearly indicated in such contracts their own particular opinions and wishes. There is another unwritten code that does not find sanction except by the tacit consent of the powers of the earth, which is known as the imperfect code. This money was paid under the law of nations as fixed by these powers, and the sum which the United States received was part of the $3,000,000 provided for in the second article of the treaty.

The treaty, as I said, was ratified in 1866 by this body. I do not know whether there are any Senators here now who sat in the Senate in 1866. I think, however, there are. I think there are some gentlemen within the sound of my voice to-night who occupied seats on this floor when the treaty came up here for ratification, and who had before them all the light and all the facts which are known to-day in reference to this transaction.

Here, then, we find that the Senate of the United States ratified the treaty with this whole affair before it, for nothing has happened since then to change in one single particular the state of the case as it existed when the treaty was ratified. Every fact existed at that time which exists now, and I say that I have been astonished at the declamation that has been indulged in here in regard to the immorality and the unlawfulness of a transaction which received the solemn ratification of this body sitting under all the solemn obligations of the Constitution.

Now, after years have transpired and not one single new fact has been presented, with this judgment of the body standing here on your record, you come up and you arraign your own judgment as a flagrant violation of the rights of a weak state. You proclaim to your country that the action or judgment of the Senate was an outrage, without having a single fact before you that was not before the Senate when it did that act.

I say in view of this I am justified in repeating what I said the other day that the Senate of the United States is placing itself in a ridiculous position in the eyes of its own citizens and of the world by indulging in this sort of talk with respect to the outrage committed upon Japan. If this case was the outrageous one that we hear of, why did not some Senator in 1866 stand up here and proclaim it? There are members here who were sitting then in this body; they knew all about it; and still they ratified it, because without that ratification not one dollar of this money could have been paid.

Now the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, my respected friend from Connecticut, who told us that he was about to leave us, and he knows very well that nobody in this body regrets his departure more than I do, tells us that he wants to complete the full measure of his public life by carrying through the Senate this bill in the form in which he has reported it to us. He knows there is hardly anybody here who would be willing to go any further than I am in indulging him in anything that might gratify his wishes or his pride; and nothing gives me more pain in connection with this transaction than the fact that my own sense of duty compels me on this occasion to differ so widely from my honorable and much esteemed friend. But, sir, we have duties here to perform and they must be performed fairly and fearlessly, and everything that I have said in regard to this transaction is borne out by the record.

A proposed act of Congress is now reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations to do what? I have shown that by the stipulation of the treaty this money was paid and that this convention stands to-day an existing compact between the United States and all the powers that co-operated with her in that transaction. This convention is signed by England, France, the Netherlands, and by the United States and Japan; and now I say it is proposed by an act of Congress to come in and set aside this treaty in so far as it affects the United States. That is the effect of it. When was that power claimed for Congress? When has it been pretended that the simple legislative authority of the Union can be invoked to set aside at will a convention entered into between the treaty-making power and a foreign State?

I say that it may give rise to complaint that this thing is proposed to be done in this way without consulting those nations that co-operated with us in obtaining this fund. Although I am free to say that, so far as the principal is concerned, I am willing it shall go back to them in any way, when it comes to this million dollars of interest arising out of this shadowy and imaginary investment, for it was nothing more, a mere process on paper, I cannot feel it to be consistent with my duty to vote for a proposition of that kind.

This, Mr. President, is all that I propose to say.

Mr. HARRIS. This Japanese indemnity bill has been debated here now for two days; it is a Senate bill, and if passed it is not remotely probable that it will become a law. In order to test the sense of the Senate upon the question, I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. EATON. Will the Senator not give way for one moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Connecticut appeals to me.

Mr. KERNAN. I propose that we vote on the bill.

Mr. EATON. I simply want to say that my friend uttered what he believes a true prediction, that if this bill shall pass the Senate it will not become a law. Now, I will give my opinion, that if the bill passes any time between this and two o'clock to-morrow morning it will pass the House, and I hope the President will sign it.

Mr. KERNAN. Let us vote on the passage of the bill, and not on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. We have debated the bill in the Senate for two days. If I could have any assurance that we could come to a vote at once on the merits of the bill I would gladly yield for that. We may as well test the strength of the bill on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. EATON. I hope not. I hope my friend will withdraw the motion.

Mr. HARRIS. I will withdraw it if we can come to a vote. Of course I do it unconditionally, but I will renew it the first moment I get an opportunity, unless we can have a vote now. I want to end this question.

Mr. EATON. Very well, let us vote. I want to vote now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] to strike out $1,463,224 and insert $785,000.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] which will be reported by the Secretary.

Mr. EATON. I have accepted that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection it will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear it read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as an additional section:

SEC. 2. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the sum of $248,000 to be paid, out of the fund now under control of the Department of State known as the Japanese indemnity fund, to the officers and crew of the United States ship Wyoming, or to their legal representatives, for extraordinary, valuable, and specially meritorious and perilous services in the destruction of hostile vessels in the strait of Simonoseki, on the 16th day of July, 1863, and to the officers and crew of the steamer Takiang, who were detached from the United States ship Jamestown, or to their legal representatives, for similar services on the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th days of September, 1864; said sum to be distributed to the said officers and crews according to the laws of the United States governing the distribution of prize-money: Provided, That for the purpose of such distribution, the officers and crew, detached as aforesaid, who manned the Takiang, shall be regarded as a part of the forces of the Wyoming on the 16th day of July, 1863, and according to their rank and position on the 8th day of September, 1864: And provided further, That in such distribution no payment shall be made to the assignee of any mariner, but to the mariner himself only or to his duly authorized attorney, or, in case of his decease, to his legal representatives or their duly authorized attorney.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to accepting this amendment? If there is none the amendment will be considered as agreed to. The amendment is agreed to. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and still open to amendment. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAMPTON, (when Mr. HAMLIN'S name was called.) The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] is unwell and asked me to pair with him. I have done so, reserving the right to vote in order to make up a quorum. I do not know how he would vote on the passage of the bill. I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 46, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—46.

Anthony,	Dawes,	Kernan,	Rollins,
Bailey,	Eaton,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,

So the bill was passed.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. BECK submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 7203, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 17, 19, 22, 32, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 44, 45, 53, 57, 59, 61, 64, 69, 75, 77, 79, 80, 81, 83, 86, 94, and 108.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 18, 20, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28, 30, 31, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 43, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 54, 55, 56, 58, 60, 62, 63, 65, 66, 67, 68, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 76, 78, 82, 83½, 84, 85, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 107, 109, and 110; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "325,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out "60" and insert in lieu thereof "25;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out from the matter proposed to be inserted the word "thirteen" and insert in lieu thereof "seven;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate nnmbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out "75" and insert in lieu thereof "50;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out "300" and insert in lieu thereof "250;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 95, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out "81" and insert in lieu thereof "82;" and the Senate agree to the same.

As to the Senate amendment numbered 106 the committee are unable to agree.

JAMES B. BECK,
H. G. DAVIS,
WILLIAM WINDOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JAMES H. BLOUNT,
J. A. McMAHON,
JAMES MONROE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BECK. The conferees on the part of the Senate and House have agreed on every item in the bill, with the exception of the amendment numbered 106, by which the Senate struck out the following clause:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to the officers and employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual roll on the 1st day of July, 1880, one month's extra pay at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available.

That alone remains in this conference report not agreed to. The conferees on the part of the House desire to lay that disagreement before that body, as they will do very promptly, when a new conference will be ordered. In the mean time the bill can all be enrolled but that one item, so as to cause no delay. I can state very briefly what the Senate had to surrender and what the House conferees agreed to, if the Senate desires. I have the bill in my hand.

Mr. THURMAN. What is the Senator's motion?

Mr. BECK. That the report which I have made be concurred in.

Mr. MAXEY. I move that the Senate recede from its disagreement with the House on the amendment on which the conference could not agree. The House has a right, in my judgment, to control affairs in its own household, and we have a right to regulate ours. I do not think it is right for the Senate to insist upon the disagreement, and I believe the Senate ought to recede.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to the motion which has been submitted by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to have the Senator from Kentucky give us a statement so that we can understand the report.

Mr. BECK. I will.

Mr. MORRILL. We cannot understand a word about the amendments when they are merely described by numbers.

Mr. BECK. I can in ten minutes make a statement explaining the action of the conference committee on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses.

The first amendment to this bill by the Senate was an appropriation of $100,000 for a barge-office building in the city of New York. That the House conferees agreed to.

The second item was for the assay office in New York. For that we desired $30,000 to increase the size of the building, and to that the House conferees disagreed. The Senate conferees therefore receded from that amendment.

The House conferees concurred with the Senate in regard to the public building at Topeka, Kansas; the amendment in regard to the public building at Toledo, Ohio; in regard to the light-house at Stamford, Connecticut; in regard to the Point Concepcion light-station in California; and in regard to the life-saving stations increasing the appropriation from $20,000 to $25,000.

The House conferees agreed with the Senate in the amendment giving $75,000 to construct a revenue steamer for duty on the southern coast of the United States.

The Senate conferees receded from the Senate amendment in regard to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, the appropriations for which we had increased some $50,000, because upon examination we ascertained that we had given in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill $50,000, which somehow or other the officers in charge of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing failed to communicate to us. We were glad to receive the information, and because we received it (and we thought we ought to have had it before) we agreed with the House conferees on that item.

The House conferees agreed with the Senate in making small portions of the sum given for the Coast and Geodetic Survey available immediately, as Captain Patterson requested should be done.

The Senate conferees receded from the amendment giving to the Secretary of the Treasury $5,000 for the recoinage of gold and silver coin, the House conferees believing there were funds enough to be derived from other sources.

The House conferees agreed to the amendment for the construction of fisheries swept away in California, for which $10,000 was given. One or two other smaller amendments I need not take the time of the Senate to indicate; they amounted to nothing.

The Senate conferees receded from the amendment numbered 22, relative to giving the collector of customs in San Juan Island the power to enter and clear vessels. The House conferees said they had not sufficient information in that regard.

The House conferees concurred with the Senate in its amendment relative to the Alaska agency, which only changed the amount.

The House conferees agreed with the Senate in the amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain and report to Congress the harbor, pilot, and other changes upon American and foreign vessels. They also agreed to the amendment of the Senate giving $15,000 to the Secretary of the Treasury to aid in regard to the pleuro-pneumonia bill. They also agreed to the amendment of the Senate relieving Mr. Spofford, the Librarian of Congress, of liability for the amount stolen from the disbursing clerk.

Over the item relating to the Board of Health, we had a long controversy, that came very near being a permanent disagreement. The Senate had amended the House bill by striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "seventy-five," so as to give $150,000 for the expenses of the Board of Health. The $75,000 was stricken out and $50,000 was inserted, so that it will read $50,000 of the appropriation, instead of $25,000 as originally proposed by the House, or $75,000 as proposed by the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Making the whole amount $125,000.

Mr. BECK. Making the whole amount $125,000, instead of $150,000 as it passed the Senate, or $100,000 as it came from the House.

Mr. HARRIS. Dividing the difference?

Mr. BECK. We split the difference.

As to the arrears of pay and bounty the Senate had agreed upon a sum of $300,000. The House conferees believed that they had ascertained that $250,000 was the true amount; and the Senate conferees agreed to that amount.

The House conferees concurred with the Senate in the amendment giving $15,000 for machinery and shop-fixtures at the arsenal at Rock Island. They also agreed to increase the amount from $10,000 to $12,000 for improving the various reservations in the city of Washington.

The Senate conferees receded from the amendment giving $8,000 for paving with asphaltum the semi-circular roadway in front of the Executive Mansion.

The House conferees agreed with us on all the amendments relative to the Executive Mansion itself and the lighting of it. They are small items that I need not read carefully.

The Senate conferees, however, had to recede reluctantly from the amendment appropriating $450,000 for the building for the State, War, and Navy Departments, making it immediately available; also making available the amount of $150,000 given for the Washington Monument; and $200,000 proposed to be given for preparing granite for the construction of the west and center wings of the new State, War, and Navy Department building. From all these the Senate had to recede.

The next important amendment is numbered 44, $50,000 for surveys for different military departments. From that amendment the Senate conferees recede, as also from the amendment for the construction of a public building at Fortress Monroe. Several small amendments which I need not take up the time of the Senate to mention were agreed to by the House conferees.

The House conferees agreed to the item for building a road from Vicksburgh, Mississippi, to the national cemetery there. They also agreed to the construction of a carriage-way for the United States military depot at Jeffersonville, Indiana. The Senate conferees had to recede from the appropriation of $30,000 for the improvements of the barracks at Omaha. The House conferees agreed to the amendment giving $30,000 for the erection of barracks at Fort Leavenworth, and also agreed to $10,000 for the survey of the peninsula of Maryland and Delaware in regard to a ship-canal.

The House conferees agreed with the Senate in appropriating $250,000 for the selection of a site and a building for the Pension Bureau in the city of Washington, but the Senate conferees had to recede from the amendment appropriating $200,000 for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building for the safe keeping of the records. A bill for that purpose has passed the Senate, is now before the House, and may become a law yet. To the Pension Office building however the House conferees agreed, the appropriation being $250,000.

The Senate conferees receded from the amendment giving $3,500 for the construction of a boiler-house for the naval hospital at Mare Island; and the House conferees agreed with the Senate in giving $75,000 to carry on the improvements at the navy-yard at Pensacola, Florida.

The Senate conferees receded from the amendment giving $45,000 for suitable barracks for the Marine Corps at Norfolk; and the Senate conferees receded from the amendment giving $175,000 to equip a vessel to go in search of the steamer Jeannette in the arctic seas.

The House conferees agreed with the Senate in giving $25,000 for the erection of an armory at Annapolis, also for the repair of buildings there. The House conferees agreed with the Senate in giving $40,000 for the barracks and quarters at the Naval Academy at Annapolis.

The Senate conferees receded from the amendment for the fire-proofing of the roof of the National Statuary Hall, $26,000, upon the report, I desire to say to the Senator from Vermont, made to the Senate conferees that the Architect of the Capitol had to-day examined it with the House committee, and had assured them that radical changes which he was not willing to have made would be required before that could be done now, and that something more than that would have to be done before any fire-proofing could be had.

The House conferees concurred with the Senate in giving $10,000 to the Joint Committee on the Library for works of art; also for renting a building for the Court of Claims. They agreed with us in striking out several land districts, and in making immediately available $300,000 for the survey of public lands.

The Senate conferees receded from the amendment relative to the surveys in California, Oregon, and Washington Territory. They had to do it.

The House conferees agreed to the amendment appropriating $18,000 for running the lines between the States of Colorado and Kansas; and the Senate conferees receded from the amendment relative to the Hot Springs reservation. The Senate conferees agreed——

Mr. THURMAN. It was at the request of the Senator from Vermont that the Senator from Kentucky has been giving this explanation. I understand that the Senator from Vermont is now satisfied.

Mr. MORRILL. I desired only the principal items that the Senator has named. I had already ascertained that the Senate is very much of a receding body.

Mr. BECK. I assure the Senator that we came very near having no bill at all. We have done the very best we could; and until the Senate adopts some new system and asserts its right to have the appropriation bills in time to consider them, the Senate will not have much intelligent consideration of appropriation bills.

I now desire concurrence in the report of the committee of conference, and I desire to have it immediately, so that the House conferees may consult with the House in reference to the amendment upon which no agreement was reached.

Mr. THURMAN. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will state his question of order.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know exactly whether it is a question of order; perhaps it is. Last session late one night a conference report similar to this one was made, the report being that the conferees on the part of the two Houses had agreed upon every item in the bill but one. I then occupied the Chair, and I ruled that the conference report must be concurred in altogether or non-concurred in; that we could not concur in the items that had been agreed upon and leave a part of the report without any determination upon it. The next morning, having examined the precedents, I came to the conclusion that that ruling was wrong and that the precedents justified concurring in the report as far as the managers of the conference on the part of the two Houses had agreed, leaving the rest of the bill open for a further conference; and accordingly that course was taken by the Senate. The report went to the House. The Speaker of the House, notwithstanding the decision of the Senate, ruled that the report must be either wholly agreed to or wholly disagreed to; that it could not be agreed to in part, in so far as the managers had agreed and non-concurred in as to the residue. Therefore the House, as it happened at that time, solved the difficulty by receding from the amendment which was made by the House, and upon which the managers had disagreed.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator will allow me, that was done at this session of Congress.

Mr. THURMAN. It was done at this session.

Mr. BECK. Both Houses have done it.

Mr. THURMAN. I believe we have done it also, and I think it is the right practice; but I submit to my friend whether he will allow me to move that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the provision in the bill which is now the subject of controversy so as to concur with the House in that provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] has already submitted a similar motion.

Mr. BECK. That item is still in conference, and the House conferees desire the course to be pursued that I have suggested.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well.

Mr. BECK. I move that the report as made be concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would state to the Senator from Ohio that the Senator from Texas a few moments ago submitted a similar motion; but the Senator from Kentucky has stated that the matter is still in conference, and the question before the Senate will be on concurring in the report as made.

The report was concurred in.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. MCPHERSON presented the credentials of William J. Sewell, chosen by the Legislature of New Jersey a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1881; which were read and ordered to be filed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That Zenas Herrick have leave to withdraw the papers in support of his application for pension.

On motion of Mr. HILL, of Georgia, it was Ordered, That leave be granted under the rule to withdraw the papers in the act to repay to the State of Georgia certain money advanced by the State, (Senate bill No. 1134,) and that said papers be delivered to W. O. Tuggle, agent of the State.

SHIPPING FEES.

Mr. BAYARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to report to the Senate at the ensuing regular session in December a detailed statement of all fees and costs collected under laws of the United States from American shipping during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881.

RESIGNATION OF SECRETARY SHERMAN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

To the Senate of the United States:

I have the honor to inform the Senate that Hon. John Sherman, Senator-elect from the State of Ohio, has resigned the position of Secretary of the Treasury, and that said resignation has been accepted to take effect at the close of the present day.

R. B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 3, 1881.

THANKS TO THE VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. WHYTE. I offer a resolution which I am sure will meet the hearty and unanimous approval of the whole body:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are due, and are hereby tendered, to the Vice-President for the courtesy, ability, and impartiality with which he has presided over its deliberations during the present session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland asks the present consideration of the resolution. Is the Senate ready for the question? [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the resolution is unanimously adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KERNAN, Mr. LAMAR, and Mr. McDONALD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senate to the regular order recently adopted, which is the consideration of House bills upon the Calendar. The Secretary will report the first bill in order.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 5748, which was passed over the other day. I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to my friend from New York that he let us go through with the bills remaining on the Calendar that have not been called, and then we can go back and take up that bill.

Mr. KERNAN. Very well.

Mr. LAMAR. I ask that the consideration of House bill No. 6061 be continued. It is the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. It was objected to.

Mr. LAMAR. There will be no objection to the bill with the amendments which I am authorized by the committee to accept, which obviates the objections made to the bill. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the title of the bill, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the bill by its title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. No. 6061) to incorporate the Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill is objected to.

Mr. LAMAR. I have accepted every amendment that was suggested.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Mississippi to withdraw his request at present, and let us get through with the unobjected bills, and then he can ask unanimous consent to have this bill considered.

Mr. LAMAR. I assure the Senator there will be no objection made to this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I understood some Senator to object a moment since.

Mr. WITHERS. There were two or three objections entered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next House bill on the Calendar.

EDWARD T. BROWNELL.

The bill (H. R. No. 1650) for the relief of Edward T. Brownell was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Edward T. Brownell $90, it being the amount of two drafts on the United States depository at Chicago, Illinois, drawn by B. J. Sweet, late pension agent, one draft of $30 payable to Syrena McDade, and one for $60 payable to Almira M. Bacon, both of the drafts being indorsed payable to Edward T. Brownell, and still outstanding.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE W. HENDERLITE.

The bill (H. R. No. 6034) for the relief of the personal representative of George W. Henderlite, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to make such an allowance to George W. Henderlite, deceased, late collector of internal revenue for the eighth collection district of Virginia, as will make his net compensation equal to $2,500 per annum for the time he held the office of collector.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a report with that bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that there is no report. The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

Mr. BAYARD. There is no report, but there is a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue among the papers which explains precisely the reasonableness of the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. May we hear that read?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I send to the desk the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, and also of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is a House report on the case that may be read for information. I do not know whether the Senate committee adopted it or not.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask to have the papers read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 6, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue upon House bill No. 1417, "for the relief of George W. Henderlite, late collector of internal revenue for the eighth district of Virginia," together with papers which exhibit the facts of the case and accompany the bill.

The Commissioner states in full the reasons why an allowance for compensation equal to $2,500 per annum during the entire period of Collector Henderlite's incumbency was not made by this Department.

I see no sufficient reason existing why the compensation of ex-Collector Henderlite should be finally adjusted at a sum so much below that of other collectors of the same district who preceded and followed him.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN RANDOLPH TUCKER,
House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, March 30, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit House bill No. 1417 and accompanying papers, in which it is proposed to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make such an allowance to George W. Henderlite, late collector of internal revenue of the eighth district of Virginia, as will make his net compensation equal to $2,500 per annum for the time he held the office, referred to this office by Hon. J. R. TUCKER for report as to the facts in the case.

The records of this office show that for the period from June 4, 1869, to June 30, 1873, Mr. Henderlite was paid the salary and commissions allowed by law, and for the period from July 1, 1873, till the expiration of his term of service he was paid by special allowance a net compensation at the rate of $2,500 per annum.

For the period first named Mr. Henderlite received as salary and commissions $11,507.17. His expenses of office for this period, as shown by vouchers submitted to this office, were $5,883.49, leaving as net compensation for the period of four years and twenty-seven days $5,623.68, or at the rate of $1,380.39 per annum.

After Mr. Henderlite went out of office, and prior to the settlement of his accounts, he made application to this office for an additional special allowance to make up to him a reasonable salary for his term of service, a recommendation for which would probably have been made had his accounts with the United States been settled.

After his accounts were settled by the accounting officer of the Treasury, (February 25, 1875,) the Secretary of the Treasury, by act of Congress passed February 8, 1875, was deprived of the power to make further allowances to collectors of internal revenue for services, except within one year after such services were rendered.

In view of these facts this office is of the opinion that the relief proposed in the inclosed bill is entitled to favorable consideration.

In this connection I would state that the accounts of Mr. Henderlite's predecessor were adjusted on the basis of an allowance at the rate of $2,500 per annum personal salary.

Respectfully,

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. DAVIS.

The bill (H. R. No. 6860) for the relief of William H. Davis was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated by the Quartermaster's Department the alleged taking by the United States authorities, for the use of the United States troops during the years 1861 and 1862, of a certain wharf and warehouse property, formerly situated in San Diego, California, alleged to have been the property of William H. Davis, of Oakland, California, and to have been used by troops of the United States for fuel; such investigation to extend to the title of the property and the incumbrances thereon, the status of the owner, whether legal or not, the value of the property destroyed, the circumstances of the destruction, and by whose direction, authority, or permission it was destroyed, and the reasons for the neglect to give notice to the War Department at or soon after the destruction occurred.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection to make to this bill as I understand it, but I think the report should be read or the Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY] should state as he can in a word what it is.

Mr. FARLEY. A similar bill passed this body about a year ago, or a little over. It was sent to the House. The House passed the pending bill, but improving the bill, in my judgment, from its condition at the time it passed the Senate. It provides that a commission shall be appointed by the Secretary of War to ascertain the value of the property said to have been taken by the troops of the United States in 1861 and 1862, and shall have testimony as to the taking of the property and the value thereof taken and reported to the next Congress. The bill as it passed the House was referred to the Committee on Claims, and they have reported it back and recommend its passage.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire if this is the claim for compensation for the use of a wharf?

Mr. FARLEY. That is the case.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that I have examined the case very carefully, and it seemed to me a case in which there should be compensation made in some shape.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is a stronger bill than the bill that passed the House. The House changed the bill as it passed the Senate, referring the matter to the Secretary of War and empowering him to report the facts, which was not required by the Senate bill. The Committee on Claims accept this bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEVI PRICE.

The bill (H. R. No. 6478) for the relief of Levi Price was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Levi Price, of Frederick County, Maryland, $200, and to cause to be credited to him by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue $1,740.23, the amount of tax improperly assessed against him.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. COCKRELL. I sent to the document-room for the report, but I understand it has not been received back from the Printer. There is a written report in the case. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] has charge of it, and reported the bill from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I hope the Senator from Maryland will state what it is.

Mr. GROOME. I will state the case as I find it upon the papers, which I have in my hand. Levi Price was a distiller at Frederick, Maryland. As such distiller, his distillery was rated to make three and one-half gallons of spirits to every bushel of grain mashed. It did not make the amount which it was so rated to make at the Internal Revenue Bureau. The bureau, however, is fully satisfied, and Commissioner Raum has so stated, that it did not make it, because of the fact that the distillery was defectively constructed. He has stated in strong language that he is satisfied this is an honest distiller and that he has paid every dollar of the internal-revenue tax upon the liquor actually distilled in that distillery, and he has said, as appears in my written report, that a bill authorizing him to abate these deficiency taxes would have his hearty approval.

These taxes form the whole amount covered by this bill, except $200. The bill proposes to pay to Mr. Price $200 for this reason: when it became apparent that the distillery would not make the amount of liquor at which it was rated, the Internal Revenue Bureau directed this distiller to purchase a Tice meter, for which he deposited $200 with the officers of the Government. But before the meter was put into use he was peremptorily directed by the officers of the Government not to use that meter, it having been ascertained that a meter of that kind was not a suitable one for the purpose of ascertaining the amount made by the distillery; so that, by a like imperative direction of the Government officials by which he was made to expend $200, he was ordered not to use the meter. That, in a few words, is a statement of the facts upon which the bill is based.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM REDUS.

The bill (H. R. No. 4438) for the relief of William Redus was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to pay to William Redus $3,600, out of money belonging to the nation of Osage Indians, in payment in full for one hundred and forty-four beeves taken from him by them on the 28th of June, 1872.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. HOAR. There is a House report in the case. If I can make a two-minutes' statement the Senate probably will not care about hearing the report. If they do, let it be read.

This is a case where a drover claimed that his drove of cattle was attacked when under his personal charge by Indians and some six thousand dollars' worth of cattle taken from him and destroyed or carried off. The fact was proved by his own testimony, by the testimony of the men in his employ, and by a good deal of circumstantial evidence showing that the Indians were in the neighborhood and attacked other droves. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs had the case carefully investigated, and is satisfied that the loss occurred and ought to be paid, and recommends the payment of this sum, cutting down the drover's estimate of the value of his cattle from about six thousand dollars to $3,600. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his letter recommending the passage of this bill, states that the Indians in council admitted that they had made this raid and carried off a portion of the property, but asserted that the drover's valuation was too high. That is the whole story.

Mr. McDONALD. Is this amount to be deducted from the moneys due the Indians?

Mr. HOAR. This amount is to be paid from the Indian fund.

Mr. McDONALD. From the Indian annuities?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, and from nothing else.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts what Indians made the raid?

Mr. HOAR. The Osage Indians. The name of the tribe is mentioned in the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed

JOHN H. AND ROBERT F. SHUGART.

The bill (H. R. No. 3782) for the relief of John H. Shugart and Robert F. Shugart was announced as next in order upon the Calendar.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the report in that case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that the report has not been printed. The Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH,] the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, made the report.

Mr. CONKLING. Is the manuscript of the report here?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has gone to the Printer, the Chair is informed. The Senator who reported the bill does not appear to be in his seat.

Mr. ROLLINS. I suggest that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. KERNAN. That is the last House bill on the Calendar, I understand, and now I ask that House bill No. 2064 be taken up.

KENTUCKY STATE CLAIMS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. No. 4905) to declare the true intent and meaning of "an act to reimburse the State of Kentucky for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion," approved June 8, 1872, was read twice by its title.

Mr. BECK. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that a bill just over from the House?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It came over to-night.

Mr. MORRILL. Has it been read at all?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. BECK. May I make a statement? The Third Auditor shows that other States, Ohio, Indiana, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Missouri, under exactly similar acts, have been settled with. In the act that was passed for Kentucky the title named all these things, but the accounting officer thought the account of the State of Kentucky could not be settled without giving him this authority, although the others had been settled with under acts precisely like it which I have before me. That is all there is of it. We are very anxious to have the matter settled, as all the others have been settled with under a similar law. I hope the bill will pass. There is a unanimous report from the House committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator from Kentucky to allow the bill to lie over for a few minutes until I can confer with him.

Mr. BECK. Certainly I will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over informally.

Mr. BECK subsequently said: On conference with the Senator from New York, I think there will be no objection to the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4905) to declare the true intent and meaning of "an act to reimburse the State of Kentucky for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion," approved June 8, 1872. It provides that in adjusting the claim of the State of Kentucky the term "equipment" shall be construed to mean and include the arming of the forces as an essential part of their equipment; and the word "supplying" shall include forage and fuel, and the transportation shall be embraced as indicated in the title of the act, it being the intention of Congress in the passage of the act to settle and adjust the accounts.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator from Kentucky say there is a House report in this case?

Mr. BECK. There is a unanimous report of the House Committee on War Claims.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear it read. It seems to be a subject of importance sufficient to require some explanation at least.

Mr. BECK. I read the concluding part of the House report on the bill:

This act of June 8, 1872, in its title, says the accounts for "arming," "subsisting," "equipping," "transporting;" but when the claim again came in for adjustment the Solicitor compelled, by his construction, the accounting officers to reject the accounts for "arming," for "transporting," for "fuel," and for "forage." It was evidently the intention to give the State full relief. It is folly to suppose they would pay for equipments and not arms, that they would pay for subsistence and not forage and fuel, and not pay the transportation account, when the title of the bill says these were its objects. Besides, Missouri was paid these very accounts. We therefore unhesitatingly say it is just and right that the intention (founded on the good faith of the Government toward the States who acted on its promises and expended their money for its benefit) of the act of June 8, 1872, should be carried out and not thwarted. To do so we report the accompanying as a substitute for the bill referred to us and recommend its passage.

Mr. LOGAN. How much is the claim?

Mr. BECK. I do not know exactly.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky, will not that involve a reopening of the other cases that have been settled on a different principle?

Mr. BECK. No, sir; every other State has been settled with under exactly a similar law to this. The act was passed in 1872, and a subsequent construction was given to these words different from the other acts.

Mr. CONKLING. The others were like it?

Mr. BECK. Missouri had an act passed like it, so had West Virginia, so had Ohio and Indiana. They were settled with under precisely similar acts.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUTHERN CLAIMS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a House bill reported to-day to which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] has called attention which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read by its title the bill (H. R. No. 5521) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and acts amendatory thereof.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that bill just reported from a commitee?

Mr. COCKRELL. It came to-day from the House, it was read twice, referred to the Committee on Claims, and has been reported back favorably by that committee.

Mr. INGALLS. To-day?

Mr. COCKRELL. To-day.

Mr. INGALLS I will object to the third reading of the bill until an explanation at least has been made by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly, I will state that this is to pay the last allowance made by the commissioners of claims, commonly called the southern claims commission. Their term of office and jurisdiction expired and they made their tenth and last report to Congress on the 9th of March, 1880, and this bill is simply to pay the claims, as we have done for nine years preceding, as they have been reported by that commission.

There is but one item in this bill which is not in the report of the commission. There was an amendment added to the bill in the House, which is the second section, and to which attention will be called. That is the only part of the bill, I presume, about which there can be the least possible controversy.

Mr. INGALLS. Has the bill been read at length?

Mr. COCKRELL. It has not been; it was read the second time by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims. I had the whole matter thoroughly examined while the bill was pending in the House, except the second section.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the bill been printed?

Mr. COCKRELL. The House bill has been printed for a month, but not this section. The House bill has been printed as it passed the House, except the second section.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the section read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section indicated will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Quartermaster-General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to examine, adjust, and settle the claims of Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, late of Natchez, in the State of Mississippi, growing out of the occupation and use by the United States Army, during the late rebellion, of the property of the said Haller Nutt during his life-time, or of his estate after his decease, including live stock, goods, and moneys taken and used by the United States or the armies thereof. And full jurisdiction is hereby given to the Quartermaster-General to try and determine the same; and he may consider the evidence heretofore taken on said claim, so far as applicable, before the commissioners of claims, and such other legal evidence as may be adduced before him in behalf of the legal representatives of Haller Nutt, deceased, or in behalf of the United States: Provided, That no part of said claims upon which said commissioners of claims have passed on the merits shall be considered by the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will now send to the Secretary the report which was made upon this bill in the House of Representatives. I find that in the House "Mr. TYLER, from the Committee on War Claims, reported the following bill" as a substitute for another bill. The bill is the amendment precisely; and this bill was, as I understand, attached as an amendment to the claims appropriation bill as a second section. The report upon that I have sent to the desk to be read.

Mr. HOAR. I do not believe it will be necessary to have the report read after a brief statement.

The southern claims commission, every Senator understands, of course; and there is added to this bill, this being the last of those bills, a section authorizing the Quartermaster-General to examine and adjust a claim. I should not ordinarily have given my consent, if it had been three months ago, to add such a section to this bill; but I do not think it is just that all these things should be compelled to wait; and this is a claim of very great merit. There is evidence from some of the Union generals and well-known Union men as to the thorough loyalty of this deceased person; among others, there being a letter from General Grant, and there are several others that I do not remember; but the loyalty of the claimant is beyond dispute, and therefore I gave my consent.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the amount of this claim?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Missouri will state.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Nutt claim was originally for everything about one hundred and two thousand dollars. The commissioners of southern claims allowed $56,000. This is simply authority to the Quartermaster-General to examine the items that the southern claims commission held they had no jurisdiction of, and an amount of $9,000 which it was charged was taken possession of in a bank by General Brayman and turned over to the United States.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This section I believe has not been before the Committee on Claims for its consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was submitted to-day, as the Senator remembers, and I had the report read to a number of Senators.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, but I had not time to examine it.

Mr. COCKRELL. The rest of the bill is all right, and I think there is no harm in this section.

Mr. HOAR. If this matter had come up three months ago, it would have seemed to me that we should have insisted that this claim be dealt with separately; but it has come up in this way on the last night of the session, and in connection with the closing of the southern claims commission. It is an authority given to the Quartermaster-General of the Army to examine the claim; we do not affirm its justice; and it is a claim of the very greatest and clearest merit. He was a Union man who made very great sacrifice for the Union cause in the rebel territory, and whose absolute loyalty and high character are shown beyond dispute. Under these circumstances, I thought it proper to let the section stand. He had a safe conduct from General Grant, signed by him personally; but our troops were obliged to use his material on his plantation, including his fences and all his stores, and $9,000 were taken from a bank by a general.

Mr. COCKRELL. General Brayman, at Natchez.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no amendment be proposed——

Mr. INGALLS. I objected to the third reading of the bill to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The present occupant of the chair was not aware of the objection.

Mr. HOAR. As one objection sends this bill over and, of course, prevents its passage, I suggest to the chairman of the committee to obtain, if he can, the consent of the Senator from Kansas or unanimous consent to the passage of the bill amended by striking out this doubtful section, and let the bill go back to the House and be passed there with the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. INGALLS. Upon the assurance of the Senator from Missouri that he has himself personally examined the items contained in the first section of the bill and is satisfied that they are correct and that the bill ought to pass in that form, I am willing to withdraw my objection if the second section can be stricken out; but I shall resist the reading of the bill or the passage of the bill if the understanding is that this is to go into a committee of conference with that amendment, and where by some sort of parliamentary juggle it is to be reinstated and the bill passed on the report of the conference committee.

The proposed section is a very wide departure from justice and from good parliamentary practice. It authorizes the Quartermaster-General to examine, adjust, and settle a claim that is confessedly one of very grave importance and of very considerable amount. There is no doubt that this practice of bringing in bills here on the last day of the session and having them read twice by title, and the third time not at all, and passed, when the rules require that they should be read three times on three separate days, is very vicious and open to grave objection, and that it results in more bad legislation than all other violations of law combined.

Now, sir, upon the assurance of the Senator from Missouri that this section shall be stricken from the bill, I will withdraw my objection and allow it to be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will state to the Senator that this bill has been before the House for some time. The report was made in 1880. Anticipating that it might pass during the close of the session, I had it examined and compared, and examined all the papers, and was under instructions from the Committee on Claims to report the bill properly.

Mr. INGALLS. That is the first section.

Mr. COCKRELL. The first section of the bill, and I knew nothing of this other section until I took the bill to compare with the printed bill of the House to see if it corresponded, and I struck this section, and I have devoted all the time I could since to find out about this matter, and the report that I have sent to the desk and the bill that the Senate has before it contain all the information I can get. I never heard of the matter before.

I say myself that I do not approve of that mode of legislation, and had it been at any other time in the session I should have reported and the Committee on Claims would have reported to strike it out; but I conferred with as many members as I could and we concluded to leave it to the Senate. I say frankly I do not think the bill could have come from the Committee on Claims in that shape at any other time, but rather than have no bill now I will consent that that section be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas withdraws his objection and moves to strike out the second section.

Mr. CONKLING. It is not necessary to withdraw any objection to the third reading of the bill, and if the Senator withdraws it I will renew it. If the Senator from Missouri moves to strike out the second section, that can be done and must be done before the third reading, and it being stricken out no objection will be made to the bill. Unless it is stricken out, if the objection is withdrawn I will renew it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If objection is made the Chair holds that the bill cannot be read a third time to-day. Does the Senator from Missouri move to amend the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will, in view of the facts, move to strike out the second section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is objection to the third reading withdrawn?

Mr. INGALLS. Not until the section is stricken out.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that action be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to strike out the second section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Now I will withdraw my objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CHEROKEE AND ARKANSAS RIVER RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. LAMAR. I ask for the consideration of House bill No. 6061.

Mr. CALL. I hope we shall proceed with the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has been recognized by the Chair. The Chair did not hear his motion.

Mr. LAMAR. My motion is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6061) to incorporate the Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Several Senators objected.

Mr. LAMAR. I have made a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves to postpone the pending order in order that he may ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest that there are two or three House bills here which will only take a few moments to which there is no objection, and if the Senator will just let us go through with those he can then take up his bill. They are in order. There is order of business No. 985, which was called up by the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS,] being the bill (H. R. No. 4874) in relation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] has some amendments he desires to offer, and then there will be no objection. The bill is a matter of a good deal of importance to the delegation.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I object to the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Senator from Mississippi has moved to postpone the pending and prior orders in order that he may ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill mentioned by him. That motion is in order.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to the Senator from Mississippi proceeding with the consideration of his bill; I shall be glad to aid him in it; but there are others of us who have been standing by the Calendar under the rule which has been adopted. It will take but a very few minutes to consider the Calendar and it will be impossible for these House bills to have any consideration unless we proceed with the regular order, which has been followed up to this time.

Mr. LAMAR. I will state that this bill is a House bill which has been reported, taken up, partly considered, and passed over informally.

Mr. CALL. I am aware of what my distinguished friend suggests and I gave way for the greater part of the day to him. I will, however, in deference to him, withdraw any objection on my part.

Mr. TELLER. I believe the bill the Senator from Mississippi wishes to have taken up will occupy some time, and I ask him if he will not allow us to take up the other bill?

Mr. LAMAR. Let my bill come up, and then I will agree to lay it aside.

Mr. TELLER. With the understanding that the Senator will allow us to get the other bill in, I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi that the pending and prior orders be postponed in order that he may move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 6061.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope that the bill will not be taken up to-night. This is the incorporation of a railroad company and granting the right of way through the Indian Territory, permitting the company to condemn land, and all this just at the close of a session. It seems to me that we have not time to pass such a bill now.

Mr. PLUMB. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will not insist on any objection to this bill. The Senator from Mississippi is prepared to accept amendments which have been suggested to him, and when the bill comes up these amendments, I have no doubt, will be put in such a way as to satisfy the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAMAR. Now I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6061) to incorporate the Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I thought another bill was to be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Mississippi to move to postpose the pending and prior orders in order to move to take up this bill. The Chair also understood the Senator from Mississippi to consent to lay it aside informally for the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. I object to the consideration of that bill. I shall vote against the consideration of every railroad bill which is brought up here to-night. I do not think there is time to pass a railroad bill at this late hour of the session.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the bill is up, and the Senator from Mississippi is willing to yield to me a moment for the bill I named.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill called for by the Senator from Mississippi is the pending order.

Mr. TELLER. Now, I ask the Senator to yield to me informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island objects. The Clerk will report the bill before the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. No. 6061) to incorporate the Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want the bill read.

Mr. MCDONALD. What is the state of this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the bill at length.

Mr. COCKRELL. It has not all been read, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Part of it has been read, as the Chair is advised. The Clerk will report the rest of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Chair state to the Senate whether it has all been read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk answers that it has not been, and he is instructed to report the bill in full.

The Chief Clerk read the bill in full.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of section 4:

And the said corporation shall also file, within one year from the passage of this act, the consent of the Indian tribes through whose land the said road may be projected to the passage of said road, evidenced by the acts of their councils and authenticated by the President of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. I thought the idea was that before the company begin they shall furnish that consent.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am going to provide for that in a subsequent amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me ask the Senator from Ohio if that amendment requires this consent to be obtained after this date?

Mr. PENDLETON. It requires the consent to be obtained after this date and within a year.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me hear it read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again read.

The amendment was read.

Mr. PADDOCK. How is this consent to be obtained? It ought to be provided that it should be given in open council of the Indians.

Mr. PENDLETON. It says it shall be evidenced by the acts of their council.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think those words should be inserted: "by the consent of the Indians in open council."

Mr. PENDLETON. I have no objetion to the words "open council." Let the amendment read, "evidenced by the acts of their open councils." I am willing to insert the word "open."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio so modify his amendment?

Mr. PENDLETON. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAMAR. I am authorized by the Committee on Railroads to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CONKLING. I will take this occasion to rise to a question of order, as I have heard several times that suggestion made. No committee can accept an amendment. I submit that with great confidence to a parliamentarian so experienced as the present occupant of the chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is proposed by the Senator from Ohio, and the chairman of the committee indicates instructions from his committee to accept it. The Chair thinks the point of order raised by the Senator from New York is technically correct, and will sustain it; but the question will be upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. INGALLS. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the Indian nations through whose territory this contemplated road runs have legislative assemblies, and that the term "council" which he employs in his amendment is not one that could properly be used in connection with the Cherokee and other civilized nations that occupy that Territory.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am perfectly willing to amend the amendment or to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas if he is assured that that is the proper technical term to use.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no amendment to offer, because I am not familiar myself with the technical term that should be employed; but the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Arkansas, who represent States adjacent, know that those tribes have a political organization with regular elective legislative assemblies that meet annually.

Mr. GARLAND. The designation is "the council."

Mr. PLUMB. I have before me a treaty made with the United States in 1866, in which that legislative body of which my colleague speaks is spoken of as "the council of the Cherokee Nation."

Mr. GARLAND. That is true of all the tribes there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio modify the amendment?

Mr. PENDLETON. No, sir; I adhere to my amendment.

Mr. PADDOCK. I understand my proposition to have been adopted about an open council.

Mr. PENDLETON. I accepted that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. On line 3, section 6, I move to strike out the words "from the passage of this act" and insert "after the consent of the Indians shall be filed as aforesaid."

Mr. INGALLS. Why should the company begin to construct their line before the consent of the Indians is obtained.

Mr. PENDLETON. They do not, and they have no authority to commence, as the Senator will see from the preceding amendment. The consent of the Indians must be filed before the power to condemn the right of way attaches.

Mr. INGALLS. Then the words "shall begin to construct its line within six months" are needless.

Mr. PENDLETON. That is six months after they get the consent of the Indians.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio if his amendment does not leave this company at liberty to begin and finish this road if they get the consent of the Indians at that time.

Mr. PENDLETON. Not at all. You will see if you read the amendment adopted to the fourth section that it makes it a condition precedent to the attaching of a power to condemn a right of way that this consent shall first be filed in the office of the Interior Department.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator does not understand my point. The bill as reported obliges the construction of the road to begin within six months and to be completed within two years from the passage of the act. The act dies, therefore, as originally reported, unless within two years the road is completed. That, of course, is a proper provision. It should not stand and hang over all mankind for one hundred years, the company not using it. Now the Senator proposes to strike out altogether any limitation of time with reference to the passage of the act and simply say that any time within two years after the Indian tribes have consented they may construct the road. So that if the Indian tribes consent for the first time fifty years hence, fifty-two years hence, they may finish this road. They may hang it up, therefore, over all mankind in the mean time.

Mr. PENDLETON. They must acquire the consent of the Indians within one year, and after the one year has elapsed and the consent has been given they can finish their road in that year.

Mr. HOAR. Has that been put in?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I was not aware of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer as an additional section to the bill:

SEC. 7. Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal the foregoing act or any portion thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I am not quite sure that I understand the effect of this bill as it now stands; but by virtue of the amendment just adopted at the close of the fourth section, it seems that the consent of the Indians who own these lands in common by virtue of their tribal relation, not as individual owners, has first to be obtained in order that this right of way may exist through the reservation over which it is proposed to construct the road. Now, I do not understand, if that consent has been obtained, that there is any longer occasion for the existence of the power to condemn the right of way through the reservation. I do not see how it can be possible. If I am correct in my apprehension upon that point, then it will be proper to further amend the bill by striking out of the fifth section all these provisions which relate to the condemnation of the right of way. When there is no property in these reservations, except that which is owned by virtue of the tribal relation and the assent of those who represent the tribal relation, the control of the property has already been obtained as a condition precedent, why is there any need of the provision for the condemnation of the right of way?

Mr. DAWES. I think the Senator from New Hampshire assumes what is certainly not so, that there may not be interests in that property in individual Indians as well as the tribal property; but whether there be or not, the tribe may consent to that very process of determining the value of the property which is taken by the railroad. They may consent to its going through there and to the property being condemned in the very manner prescribed.

Mr. BLAIR. These provisions relate only to condemning the right of way over the reservation.

Mr. PADDOCK. Does the bill itself prescribe the method of condemnation?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, through and over the reservation, and we have already adopted an amendment that the right of way shall be obtained by virtue of the consent of the tribe. I think it a dangerous and certainly unnecessary provision if the purpose of this amendment is to do what the Senate evidently understands. It is to first obtain the free and full consent of those who own these Indian rights to the condemnation of these Indian rights.

If anything further is designed, and if it is intended that these provisions in this section shall still remain, and that they shall be of any consequence, I have, what seems to me at least, very serious objections in regard to the provisions themselves. You will observe by reading on the top of page 5, beginning in line 20 of section 5, this provision:

And if at the time of such taking there shall be no judge of a court of record ithin said Indian Territory, or having jurisdiction over any part thereof, then condemnation shall be made and compensation paid for property taken and damages sustained under such regulations and before such tribunal as the President shall appoint.

This is a provision with reference to the exercise of the power of eminent domain, the taking of vested rights in private property by condemnation for public use with suitable compensation therefor. I do not understand how a power of that kind can be exercised by a mere ministerial tribunal which may be appointed by the President.

The power is a judicial power, or if not a judicial power, it is certainly a legislative power, and I am not aware that we are capable of delegating our powers of legislation to the President or anybody else. We may constitute a court, to be sure; but I do not understand that we have the power to delegate to the President the authority to constitute a court or a tribunal which may adjudicate vested rights of private property. We may enact a law authorizing the President to nominate and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint judges, but I do not comprehend how we can delegate to the President the right to constitute a tribunal which may exercise the power of eminent domain under such rules and regulations as he or that tribunal may see fit to adopt.

It seems to me that these provisions are utterly unconstitutional and void, for they are enacted in the form of legislation. I have had no opportunity of studying this bill carefully; but the more I reflect upon this provision the more it seems to me that it is utterly nugatory and a violation of the Constitution.

If the amendment which has been moved at the close of the fourth section means precisely what we understand it to mean, if it provides that the assent of the Indians shall be obtained before there can be any condemnations or before there can be any location of this right of way, if it means that in good faith, then there can be no objection it seems to me to striking out of the fifth section all after the word "line" in the fifth line of the section all the provisions with reference to the condemnation of the right of way, taking these vested rights of private property, down as far as the word "appoint" in the twenty-sixth line. Then the provision in the three succeeding lines may remain:

Said railroad and telegraph may be constructed through any military or other reservation set apart for the use of the United States.

These lines are well enough, and so also is this additional provision:

Provided, That property rights belonging to Indians in their tribal relations shall be included among property rights protected by this section.

Changing that word "section" to "act," it would be well enough.

For the purpose of eliciting the advice of those who comprehend these legal difficulties much better than I do, I move to strike out of the fifth section, after the word "line," in the fifth line, all down to and including the word "appoint," in the twenty-sixth line. If that should be adopted I think it would be proper to amend further in the thirty-first line, by substituting "act" for the word "section."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out of the fifth section, commencing with line 5, the following words:

And for that purpose to condemn a right of way to the extent of one hundred feet on each side of the central line of its said road; also grounds adjacent to said right of way for stations, buildings, depots, machine-shops, side-tracks, turn-outs, and wood, coal, and water stations, not to exceed twenty acres for each station, to the extent of one station for each ten miles of its road: Provided, That it does not conflict with existing treaties; and said corporation may enter upon and take private property subject to and in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of an act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862;" and if at the time of such taking there shall be no judge of a court of record within said Indian Territory, or having jurisdiction over any part thereof, then condemnation shall be made and compensation paid for property taken and damages sustained under such regulations and before such tribunal as the President shall appoint.

Mr. BLAIR. If there is no objection I will add to the amendment the remainder of the section, so as to strike out all to the end after the word "line" in the fifth line.

The Chief Clerk read the remaining words of the section, as follows:

Said railroad and telegraph may be constructed through any military or other reservation set apart for the use of the United States: Provided, That property rights belonging to Indians in their tribal relations shall be included among the property rights protected by this section.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I would like to ask some gentleman who is versed in the provisions of this bill and the laws of the States which adjoin this Territory, whether the legislative council of the Indian Territory cannot grant to this company the very charter they are seeking from Congress, or whether, if they cannot do that, the Territory cannot grant the right of way to build a road under a charter procured from one of the adjoining States. If such is the case, I think it is a very wrong thing for us here in the Senate at this late hour of the session to be passing an act of incorporation for this company. They have their rights, it seems to me, either in the adjoining States or in the Territory itself. I am not lawyer enough to know exactly what those rights are, but it seems to me the legislative council of the Territory have the right to grant the very thing these incorporators ask of us.

Mr. BLAIR. Precisely. That is assumed to be provided for by the amendment to the fourth section.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I think the Revised Statutes are very full on the subject, and I do not think there is any railroad company which desires to build a railroad, that should ask Congress to give them anything more than is now provided in the Statutes at Large, volume 18. I have the section before me here. I think there is ample authority in the law now for the Territories to give railroad companies the right to build, and I think it would be a very unwise thing to be compelled to vote on an important bill like this, of this great length, without having some time to examine it. I shall vote against it. I was at first inclined to vote for the bill, but when I heard it read I was startled at the length and breadth of the rights it gives.

I may be wrong, but I think there is enough law now to build this road, and I say we ought not at this late hour of the session to grant these rights.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. BLAIR.]

Mr. CONKLING. I wish the Senator from New Hampshire had moved to strike out this section, unnecessary the whole of it, as I think, and vicious the whole of it, as I believe. Some Senator remarked that so much of it ought to stand as consists of these words:

Said railroad and telegraph may be constructed through any military or other reservation set apart for the use of the United States.

Never in my belief ought those words to be in any bill, and the effect of them is, if I understand it aright, to allow the corporation thus to be created to pick and choose for itself where it will go over any reservation, military or otherwise. That should not be. On the contrary it should be subject to the custodian of that reservation, to the consent of the Secretary of War if it be a military reservation, or to the consent of the other custodian and trustee of the reservation if it be one of a different sort. So those words do not commend this section to me at all.

What else is there in it? Some Senator standing near me says permission in the opening lines to this corporation to go on and build this road. Does any lawyer suppose that words are needed in the fifth section for that? The preceding sections incorporating these people, incorporating them to build a road, stating that, does any Senator suppose that after that it is necessary to have provisions in the bill to declare that they may go on and build it? Not at all. But the operative portions of this section 5 are, as I think, entirely indefensible and as I think repugnant to the professions and promises of the bill.

Let me see if I understand this aright. The Indians are entitled to reservations. Over those reservations it is intended this road shall go; and the preceding sections of the bill hold out the idea that the reservations are to be traversed only by consent of their owners, the Indians. In that view what do you want with proceedings to condemn, with an exertion of what a Senator has called the power of eminent domain? Nothing.

But one Senator said there may be individual rights and as against them you may want the power to condemn. Then why not say so? This section says no such thing except as that thing is included in the drag-net spread all over these reservations as against everybody. Then we have a bill which thunders in the index about the consent of the Indians, the wards of the nation, and then brings up in this provision by not only rigorous but as I shall endeavor to show in a moment utterly unconstitutional provisions authorizing without consent and against consent a proceeding absurd wherever there is consent.

I say these provisions are unconstitutional. Let me read to any lawyer of the Senate who will listen some of these words?

And if at the time of such taking there shall be no judge of a court of record within said Indian Territory, or having jurisdiction over any part thereof—

Then what? Then what would any lawyer suppose? Why—then condemnation shall be made and compensation paid for property taken and damages sustained under such regulations and before such tribunal as the President shall appoint.

The charter under which alone this Government proceeds provides that all judicial power shall reside in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior tribunals as the Congress shall create. Possibly I may not recite literally, which I do not stop to do, the provisions of the Constitution, but I recite them with accuracy enough to refer to them, and to remind Senators of what they are. Other provisions of the Constitution and provisions of law made in pursuance of it create judicial officers of all the courts save only those of the Territories, to hold their offices during good behavior, and the Constitution and the statutes create and determine geographically and otherwise their respective jurisdictions, or more exactly speaking the jurisdiction of the courts in which they respectively preside. There is no regulation upon those courts save those found in the Constitution, in the statutes, and in the rules of the courts which courts have power to make.

One of the provisions of the Constitution to which I refer declares that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, and still another provision of the Constitution makes due process of law the process and the only one known among men in this Government in which property can be taken.

I am aware that the Supreme Court of the United States, years ago, passing upon a case which arose in New Jersey under the revenue laws, which grew out of the foreclosure of a mortgage, held that where the statute for the collection of revenue invented and established a certain process, that process might be one taking the place of judicial process pro hac vice, and that that became due process of law; but neither that case nor I will venture to say any case ever decided in a court of record went so far as to suggest that the President without the advice and consent of the Senate might appoint anybody to exercise judicial functions; that although the law alone bounded the jurisdiction of a court by certain judicial boundaries or measured it by certain ethical or statutory limits the President might as by a dispensation as if the President of the United States constituted an infallible individuality, change geographical or other limits found in the Constitution and found in the statutes constituting the boundaries of judicial jurisdiction.

I will venture to say no court ever suggested that the President of the United States could invent, promulgate, originate, authorize regulations or provisions under whatever name which would change the course or in any degree the nature or the effect of judicial proceedings.

Now, despite all this, here is a provision based upon one of the highest possible, and, as to individuals, the very highest prerogative right asserted in the Constitution, based upon the right to take private property by force, because all law which dispenses with assent is force under every system. Under the provision permitting private property to be taken by force and devoted to public use it is proposed that that power shall be exerted by a court which by law has no power, by a court appointed by the President; that is the word, "as the President shall appoint." The word is not even "designate," from which it might be inferred that he was to designate an existing court, but that such court as the President, who alone has any power on earth in that regard, may appoint, shall proceed to exert and consummate this highest power, I will venture to say, touching the property of citizens which the Constitution knows.

Whether I have stated clearly, or have failed to state clearly, this point, can there be a lawyer within the sound of my voice who for one moment supposes that such a provision can consist with the Constitution? I think not.

But, Mr. President, if it were within the Constitution, if it were effectual, I should be opposed to it in a bill of this sort; opposed to it because if these poor Indians are to be dealt with in the modes we know too well either in their public councils or in their legislatures, whichever they may be, and their consent such as it is is honestly to be made a condition-precedent to trampling over their lands, laying a railway track with switches and turnouts and erecting depots, water-stations, cattle-yards, and the various other things which sooner or later attend the laying of a railway track, if honestly the condition-precedent is to be their consent and the sale of their property by such consent, you want none of the enginery of the Constitution or of statutes by which, without consent, you reduce to a possessio pedis real estate or a right of way. Therefore I should vote against it if it were within the Constitution, and I am against it because it is without the Constitution, and I submit to the Senator from New Hampshire that his true motion is to strike out the whole of this section, unnecessary as it is as to its innocent part and vicious as I think it is in respect of every other part.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President, the objections which have just been urged against this section were very fully considered in the committee and discussed and satisfactorily answered in another branch of Congress, to which I am not permitted under the rules to refer. But as the hour is late and the bill will be defeated simply by continued debate, I shall offer no opposition to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, nor shall I object to the striking out of the whole section.

Mr. BLAIR. I accept the suggestion, and would like to have the whole section included in my motion to strike out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire

proposes to strike out the fifth section. The question is on that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. As the bill now stands it becomes an open, bald license to this company to build a road through the Indian Territory without the leave of any one, the United States or anybody else, or any provision whatever to protect vested rights of individuals or anybody's rights, except simply the right of occupancy or the tribal property, whatever that may be, upon securing the assent of an Indian council. This bill now provides that the corporation which it is proposed to charter may construct its road without any further consultation or advice or consentof any party whatever on the face of the earth, without settling for the rights of private property.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. What is there in the bill as it now stands which prevents the company from commencing the construction of its road before obtaining the consent of the Indians? Nothing but the first clause in the section which has been stricken out prevented that.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that is provided for by an amendment to the fourth section.

Mr. PLATT. Not at all.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that is the force of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.]

Mr. PLATT. The amendment to the fourth section is this, that they shall file within a year the consent of the Indian tribes.

Mr. BLAIR. They cannot do it without obtaining it.

Mr. PLATT. But they may construct their road before they file the consent, for aught that appears in the bill with that section stricken out.

Mr. BLAIR. The amendment in the sixth section was designed to guard against that state of affairs.

Mr. PLATT. That simply says they shall commence to construct six months after they have obtained consent, but there is nothing in the bill as it stands now that prevents the construction without the consent.

Mr. BLAIR. It may be that it may be so. The objection does remain—the insuperable objection as it seems to me—to this bill that it stands an open license to go without the consent of any party whatever excepting this Indian council, or that authority, whatever it may be, which represents the tribal relation and the tribal ownership, and, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, when he first addressed the Senate on this question, there probably are many private interests of an important character that would be trespassed upon and destroyed by the construction of this road over a distance of some five hundred miles.

Mr. BURNSIDE. If there is to be no further discussion on the bill, I will ask if it is in order to lay the bill on the table? I move to lay the bill on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the bill lie on the table.

The question being taken, there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 25.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Anthony,	Cockrell,	McMillan,	Slater,
Baldwin,	Conkling,	Morrill,	Vest,
Blair,	Davis of Illinois,	Paddock,	Whyte.
Burnside,	Hereford,	Platt,
Cameron of Pa.,	Jones of Nevada,	Rollins,

NAYS—32.

Bailey,	Dawes,	Kernan,	Ransom,
Bayard,	Farley,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Garland,	McDonald,	Saunders,
Bruce,	Groome,	McPherson,	Vance,
Butler,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Call,	Harris,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Coke,	Hoar,	Plumb,	Williams,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Randolph,	Withers.

ABSENT—25

Allison,	Ferry,	Jones of Florida,	Teller,
Blaine,	Grover,	Kellogg,	Thurman,
Booth,	Hamlin,	Kirkwood,	Wallace,
Brown,	Hill of Colorado,	Logan,	Windom.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,
Eaton,	Ingalls,	Pugh,
Edmunds,	Johnston,	Sharon,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire—I was not paying very marked attention—what part of section 5 was stricken out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The whole section.

Mr. TELLER. I want to offer an amendment, then. It was provided in the fifth section that the property rights belonging to the Indians in their tribal relation should be included among the property rights protected. That goes out of the section. I want to offer that as an amendment to the bill. I understand the tribes consent to the building of this railroad through that section of country. While the tribe has the title to the land in one sense, yet there is an individual right recognized there that it seems to me ought to be protected. I do not suppose anybody objects to putting in the words I propose. I think it will look a little better, at least, in the bill.

Mr. GARLAND. I think there will be no objection to the amendment. My impression was that it was provided for in a previous portion of the bill.

Mr. LAMAR. I see no objection to it, and hope it will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado offer an amendment?

Mr. TELLER. I offer the following amendment—I do not care much in what part of the bill it is inserted—let it come in after the fourth section:

Provided, That property rights belonging to Indians in their tribal relations shall be included among the property rights protected by this act.

Mr. BLAIR. Those precise words have been stricken out by a vote of the Senate. I should like to inquire if it is in order to reinsert them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that those words were included with many other words which were stricken out. If that be the truth of the case, the Chair holds that the amendment proposed is in order.

Mr. BLAIR. The Chair will allow me to say that he decides, then, under misapprehension.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear the Senator.

Mr. BLAIR. Those words are the ones contained in the twenty-ninth, thirtieth, and thirty-first lines. They are entirely distinct from the remainder of the section, and are a proviso by themselves.

Provided, That property rights belonging to Indians in their tribal relation shall be included among the property rights protected by this section.

It is a separate, independent provision, that might be in a section by itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that the amendment proposed by him, which was adopted by the Senate, was to strike out the whole of section 5. The Senator from Colorado now moves as an amendment to the bill a proviso which was a part of section 5, with a change of a part of the language of that proviso. The Chair holds that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is in order.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Chair please state what part of the section is changed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. "Section" is changed to "act."

Mr. BLAIR. That is very well. I withdraw my objection; then this will cover the whole bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi, who has charge of this bill, what are the provisions in sections 1 to 4 of the act approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," which by reference are incorporated in this act. I have been unable to lay my hand on that.

Mr. LAMAR. I have the act here.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like the Senator to give me the substance of those sections. The act has been handed me; it is a pretty long act, and I have not had time to look over it.

Mr. LAMAR. The act to which the Senator refers is a very long one, with a great many provisions in it. It is very carefully drawn and applies to all the railroads to be constructed and operated in the Territories of the United States. I cannot, at this late hour, undertake to give the substance of it. It would be a needless consumption of time. If the gentleman insists on having these provisions stated I will have the statute sent to the Clerk's desk and read. I see that the Senator has the volume on his desk before him, and I hope that whatever he finds in it suggestive of amendment or objection he will make it known.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think any provisions of this kind should be incorporated at length in the bill. As they are not, I move to strike out all after the word "thereof," in line 4, section 4, after the end of the section.

Mr. LAMAR. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is proposed in section 4 to strike out all after the word "thereof," in line 4. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And shall then be entitled to the benefits of the provisions contained in sections 1 and 4 of the act approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States."

Mr. PLUMB. This is not at all an unusual way of legislating, as the Senator from Minnesota must know. It is a very common way of legislating, and these provisions of the statute do not need to be incorporated verbally in this bill in order to become part of it. I therefore hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Will the Senate agree to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN?]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of section 6:

Provided, That Congress may from time to time prescribe and regulate the rate for carrying both passengers and freight upon the line of road so constructed, and also the tariff of rates for the transmission of messages upon said line of telegraph.

I think it will be evident to the Senate that this is an amendment which should be adopted. Here we are incorporating by an act of Congress a company for the construction of a railroad through a Territory of the United States. A corporation of this kind should be under the control of Congress; it should be so beyond all doubt, and the power should be expressly reserved in the act creating the corporation. This matter has been brought to the attention of the country by the exorbitant rates charged for freight and passengers upon the lines of railroad passing across the continent; and now that this new power is attempted to be created I trust the Senate will incorporate this provision in the act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN.]

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 365) for the relief of Hardie Hogan Helper.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; it further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the said bill; it asked a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JAMES H. BLOUNT of Georgia, Mr. JOHN A. MCMAHON of Ohio, and Mr. JAMES MONROE of Ohio managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 853) granting a pension to Caroline Stief;

A bill (H. R. No. 1453) for the relief of James R. Gordon;

A bill (H. R. No. 1649) granting a pension to William W. Church;

A bill (H. R. No. 2180) granting an increase of pension to James H. Reeve;

A bill (H. R. No. 3786) granting a pension to William C. Parker;

A bill (H. R. No. 4608) granting a pension to Betsy Elwell;

A bill (H. R. No. 5677) granting a pension to Stephen P. Benton; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 137) to create a commission for the performance of certain duties under the act of Congress providing for the erection of a monument at Yorktown and the proposed centennial celebration.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. BECK. The House having sent over the sundry civil bill with a disagreement on the part of the House to the report of the conference committee, I ask the Senate to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate agreed to the conference report, in order that I may move that the Senate disagree with the House and assent to the further conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the vote by which the Senate concurred in the report of the conference committee will be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so reconsidered.

Mr. BECK. I move now that the Senate disagree to the report of the conference committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate the message from the House.

The Chief Clerk read the message of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the Senate non-concur in the report of the committee of conference. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BECK. I now move that the Senate further insist on its amendments and agree to the further conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. BECK, Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, and Mr. WINDOM were appointed.

CHEROKEE AND ARKANSAS RIVER RAILROAD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6061) to incorporate the Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not wish to move an amendment, but I move myself to make a remark. I have observed with great pleasure that my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has of late taken a good deal of interest, just interest as I think, in the concerns and welfare of some of the Indian tribes. I have more recently observed other proceedings in the State which he so ably represents indicating that those he leaves behind him in Massachusetts when he comes here to his duties, are also deeply interested, but possibly not on the same side of the same question.

I notice in this bill just twelve men (that happens to be the common-law number of a jury competent to find upon important issues) from Massachusetts to whom this very delicate matter is to be committed. I notice that with relief, because I cannot doubt, particularly as I have the pleasure of knowing the enterprise of some of these gentlemen, that everything which falls within the sphere either of activity or sympathy for the Indians will be well regarded in the prosecution of this work, and because of the fact I feel for one acquitted from the duty of attempting to put into this bill safeguards. Nothing is so effectual as an unlimited discretion, one so little limited as it is here, when it is conceded to those of whose kind intentions there is no room to doubt. Regretting as I do the passage of this bill as I understand it, that regret is modified in the view I have attempted to state.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the bill becomes a part of the statutes of the country, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to all there is in the bill now. In the first section, after enumerating the incorporators, they are designated as—

> The Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company, with authority to construct, maintain, and operate a line of railroad and telegraph, beginning at the line between the Indian Territory and Kansas, near Arkansas City, in the State of Kansas, and running through the Indian Territory by the best practicable route, following substantially the general course of the Arkansas River, and bridging the same when necessary, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, to a point on the line between the State of Arkansas and the Indian Territory, at Fort Smith, in said State. And said corporation is vested with all the powers, privileges, and immunities necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act.

That is the bill and all there is of the bill. It authorizes the construction of this road over a space of about five hundred miles.

Mr. PLUMB. I think not.

Mr. BLAIR. How far?

Mr. PLUMB. About one hundred and ninety miles.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well; one hundred and ninety miles along the line of the Arkansas River on the best practicable route, whatever that may be, comprising much of the best land in the Indian Territory, the most valuable land and part of it Indian reservations, much of it owned by private individuals, some of it military reservations, and other portions of it subject to the complete ownership of the United States; and this corporation is clothed with the power to go from one point to the other over all these rights, corporate rights, individual rights, Indian rights, rights of the United States, without any sort of limitation on the face of the earth, without being under any obligation to pay anybody one cent for the damage which may be done to private rights, making no compensation to the Government in any way whatever and practically as independent as the sovereignty itself from one end to the other of this route. That is all there is in the bill. When you examine the remaining provisions they are simply subsidiary provisions, with reference to organizing the company, the time of holding its meetings, and subordinate provisions for the carrying into effect of these sovereign powers. That is the bill as it now stands.

Mr. PLUMB. With a few very unimportant exceptions the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire is correct. Those unimportant exceptions are that there is no Government right intervening at all. The Government does not own a foot of land between these two points.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator then answer me how the committee placed in their original bill that "said railroad and telegraph may be constructed through any military or other reservation set apart for the use of the United States?" Why is that there?

Mr. PLUMB. I presume that the party who put that in knew just as little and no more about the geography of the section of the country than the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand why a corporation should come forward with a bill of this kind and know nothing of the locality over which they propose to run. I do not understand why a committee reports a bill to the Senate of the United States and knows nothing about the geography of the locality over which the route is to pass.

Mr. PLUMB. I suppose the committee knew no more than the Senator from New Hampshire, and if he does not know anything about it, I presume the ignorance of the committee can be excused.

Mr. BLAIR. I have inspected the map, and I take it that is better authority than the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator had inspected the map he would not want any authority of the kind he suggests.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me to put a question, I should like to know why objection was offered to the amendment. I proposed to strike out the reference to chapter 152 of the Statutes, which makes special provision for passing through the public lands of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not draw this bill, nor did I report it. I am responsible for what I say and what I do in reference to it. As I said, there is not a foot of Government land between the initial and terminal points mentioned in the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will pardon me; they may go "by the best practicable route," which may carry them two hundred miles out of the way, and they may find some Government reservation there.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator very conveniently overlooks the words of limitation immediately following those which he quoted, "following substantially the general course of the Arkansas River." If he supposes that any of the people connected with this enterprise, some of whom he knows, a large number of whom are his constituents, and who will be obliged to him, no doubt, for the opposition which he is manifesting here——

Mr. BLAIR. They are not my constituents.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir; they are the Senator's constituents. More of the stock of this railroad will be represented in the State of New Hampshire than in any other State, except the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. BLAIR. I trust no constituent of mine will ever own any stock under this bill. I will advise him not to do so.

Mr. PLUMB. There is, as I said, no Government land to be crossed whatever. There is no private right to be interfered with, because there is no private right that is separable from the tribal right of the Cherokee Indians, or such other tribe of Indians as may have land intervening. Consequently, the amendment which has been adopted heretofore to section 4, providing for the consent of the Indians, covers the entire subject of rights, so far as they may be trespassed upon or infringed upon in any way by this railroad company.

It is a little singular that at this late day, after Congress has been for twenty-five years legislating in regard to the rights of railroad companies in Indian reservations, persons here who are more remote from the scene of action should have become so sensitive about the rights of these Indians. It is only a few months since that the Secretary of the Interior was assisting a railroad company to treat for its right of way through an Indian reservation in a northern portion of this country, and there is a bill upon the Calendar now reported from the proper committee ratifying the agreement. The Cherokee Nation of Indians has been set up as the flower of Indian civilization; as the sum of what could be accomplished under enlightening influences in the way of improvement. They have, as has been stated here, a legislative council; they have a public school; they have, what is a better evidence of their ability to take care of themselves, a professional lobby here in Washington, as they have had for the last fifteen or twenty years. They are competent to take care of themselves, and the railroad company knows that to get a right from that tribe to go through their lands they will undoubtedly be obliged to pay for it all that it is worth. I do not think, since the bill has been amended as it is, that any railroad company will care to undergo the black-mailing operations they would have to submit to in order to run through their lands.

Mr. CONKLING. Where is the lobby?

Mr. PLUMB. The lobby is not in reference to this bill, but in reference to the Cherokee Indians, and in reference to all other Indians, because they assume general jurisdiction over every Indian in the United States.

There is no objection, such as the Senator from New Hampshire alleges, against this bill at all. There is no question whatever that any right can be trespassed upon without the full consent of the parties concerned.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I think that no one looking at the map can fail to be convinced that this line will form an important link, when constructed, between large systems of railways in the southern portion of the Union and the northern portion, and will be a most important connection in the system of transportation of freight and trade and commerce in this country among the Indians. It seemed so to me when it was presented to the Committee on Railroads, and I gave my consent and my approval when the consent of those owning the land and having jurisdiction over it and so far advanced in civilization as to be able to take care of themselves was made conditional to the construction of this road. I understand that they themselves are satisfied with this provision as it is in the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will allow me, he will recollect that when the discussion commenced he suggested that the fifth section should certainly be retained because there were private vested rights which would be passed over by this railroad, for the obtaining of which it was necessary that machinery for condemnation should be retained in the bill. Here comes the Senator from Kansas and says there are no such vested rights. I should like to be informed how the fact is.

Mr. DAWES. I think that any one drawing a bill of this magnitude and for this purpose would be most likely to provide for any such contingency as that, whether it actually existed or not. The suggestion which the Senator from Massachusetts made which so shocked the sensibilities of the Senator from New Hampshire, was that very likely there might be private rights there and very likely the consent of the Indians to the running of this railroad over their tribal property might be upon the condition that the matter should be settled by the process of condemnation. I could not see anything so terrible in the process of condemnation of property guarded according to the methods prescribed in other laws, that would render it proper for me or that I should be called upon therefore to oppose the bill. I would rather have the bill with all the ordinary machinery connected with a corporation for the construction of a railroad provided, so that those over whose territory it goes and who have political jurisdiction thereof, who own either as tribes or as individuals property that is to be taken, may be protected as they are protected in my opinion after the amendments have been adopted which were agreed upon by the Committee on Railroads and submitted and adopted by the Senate.

I do not understand what there is that is so destructive to the rights of these Indians in this railroad. I know the zeal of the Senator from New Hampshire, and the Senator from New York. I know their untiring watchful care over the Indians always manifested, and I know how unfortunate I have been heretofore in trying to awaken other Senators—not those Senators, but other Senators—to a sense of the importance of looking out for the rights of these Indians. I know all that; and I welcome these two Senators to the ranks of those who are looking out for the Indians; but when you provide what I tried here to-day upon another bill, that you should have the consent of the Indians before you fasten them by an act of Congress to the soil whereon they were put by force, I could get just a baker's dozen to come to my aid, and no more.

Mr. CONKLING. Was that a bill for Massachusetts?

Mr. DAWES. That was not a Massachusetts bill. That was a bill that did not meet the views of the majority of the Senate, because that bill had the sanction of the distinguished Secretary of the Interior, to whom the Senator from New York alluded in such affectionate terms a few minutes since.

There is nothing in this bill, in my opinion, with the provisions which have been adopted at the suggestion of the Committee on Railroads, that trenches upon the rights of these Indians. They are protected, so far as I can see, with a sedulous care, and I am gratified that the Senate has come up to the conclusion in legislating about this bill that it is proper to consult the rights of those who own the property over which the road is to run.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts how under this bill he expects the individual rights of the Indians to be protected?

Mr. BLAIR. They have none, the Senator from Kansas informs us.

Mr. DAWES. Since the Senator from New Hampshire has cut out of the bill that which seemed to be inserted there for the protection of those rights, I leave the Senator from New Hampshire to answer.

Mr. BLAIR. I beg the Senator's pardon; that section was stricken out by consent of the committee. They found it so bad a section upon reading it a second time that it was stricken out almost by unanimous consent, with only four or five votes against it. I think the Senator perhaps voted himself to strike it out. I cannot say how that is; I am inclined to think he did. If not, he fought his own committee; he fought himself. Since the Senator has with so much pith and pathos and glory congratulated himself upon the accession of so humble an individual as myself to the ranks of those who defend the rights of the unfortunate Indians, and although sharing the fate of my distinguished friend I am very likely to be scalped on account of the company I keep, I should like to recall his attention to his original proposition that there were private rights along this route which would not be protected by the provisions of the fifth section.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator allows me, the difficulty with the Senator is——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. BLAIR. It is a little embarrassing to be interrupted in the middle of an interrogation. I was going simply to ask the Senator if, conceding the ground upon which I understand he still plants himself, that here are private rights which ought to be protected, and for the protection of which any prudent legislature would insert the necessary provisions now that the fifth section is stricken out by reason of its universally conceded unconstitutionality, as I think, whether there is remaining in the bill as it now stands any sort of protection whatever for these private rights?

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator repeat that?

Mr. BLAIR. I cannot think of repeating it; I will abandon the effort. It is quite apparent that the bill is just what I said it is. It is a license to do wrong, and not pay for it either, and nothing else.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me about all that is left is the license for this company to go in there and negotiate with these Indians. If this company goes on and takes possession of this land I do not know how the individual Indians are to be protected unless the company enters into some negotiations with the council or legislative body. It seems to me that we have a very disjointed affair here. I think some part of the fifth section might have gone out and ought to have gone out, but certainly not the whole section or even three-fourths of it. All that part that provided for the condemnation of the property of the Indians ought to have been left in, in my judgment.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to introduce myself to the Senate at this time as the occupant of a new field of duty and permission. I appear now under the license of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. I understand him to have authorized me to participate with him, and, if I can, to gain some minute share of the glory which covers him as the representative of the Indian tribes. I have understood heretofore that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has a monopoly in a large degree of the Indian question on the humane side. Indeed I have understood that that honorable Senator kept not only the Indians but the Secretary of the Interior, in some sort for his personal amusement and entertainment. I have never felt at liberty since the honorable Senator became so conspicuously and justly eminent in this field, to enter it at all. Now that he allows me to follow him, at a distance of course, I venture to say one or two words about the bill.

The honorable Senator says it is important, and he repeated that with my acquiescence both times. It is important to these Indians. When the head of King Charles came around on a pike a woman remarked that it was not much of a head; but quite an important head to him, poor man. So I think these one hundred and ninety miles of projected railway will be quite important when it is laid to the Indians whose domain it invades.

The honorable Senator who sits behind me, [Mr. PLUMB,] and who knows so much about this matter, as I confess I know but little, says the map is not here and the map should be looked at. As I cannot look at the map I venture to turn and look at him and to ask him if he will state to me, in view of these provisions, what the map does present as true?

Running through the Indian Territory by the best practicable route, following substantially the general course of the Arkansas River, and bridging the same when necessary.

The honorable Senator will perceive, I think, the point of my question when I call his attention to the act of March 3, 1875, which has come to be known as the defile act, the second section of which provides:

That any railroad company whose right of way, or whose track or road-bed upon such right of way, passes through any cañon, pass, or defile shall not prevent any other railroad company from the use and occupancy of the said cañon, pass, or defile for the purposes of its road, in common with the road first located, or the crossing of other railroads at grade.

I ought to stop and observe that this is a section of an act which grants a right of way without any provisions like these, but any company "duly organized under the laws of any State or Territory, except the District of Columbia, or by the Congress of the United States." I resume my reading of the section:

And the location of such right of way through any cañon, pass, or defile shall not cause the disuse of any wagon or other public highway now located therein, nor prevent the location through the same of any such wagon road or highway where such road or highway may be necessary for the public accommodation; and where any change in the location of such wagon road is necessary to permit the passage of such railroad through any cañon, pass, or defile said railroad company shall before entering upon the ground occupied by such wagon road cause the same to be reconstructed at its own expense in the most favorable location and in as perfect a manner as the original road.

I ask the Senator whether the map to which these words apply, "the general course of the Arkansas River, and bridging the same when necessary," discloses any defile, cañon, or pass, and if it does, this being after-legislation and giving to this company a monopoly in this regard, whether it will supersede the provision which qualifies, and qualifies only, the general act of incorporation found in the section which precedes it?

Mr. PLUMB. There is no defile within the meaning of that act along the Arkansas River in the Indian Territory. It is substantially an open country. The provision is that if there is any necessity for bridging the river the railroad company may bridge it at convenient points rather than go around its circuitous course. There is no narrow defile there in which the road could monopolize the available space at all. In fact, there is room for ten, fifteen, twenty, or fifty tracks at any point on the Arkansas River in the Indian Territory along the contemplated line; so that there is no priority of right, so far as that part of the bill is concerned, contained in the bill at all.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. I ask the Senator from New York to allow me to present the final conference report on the sundry civil bill, so that the bill may be enrolled. It will not detain the Senate long.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. BECK submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 7203, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 17, 19, 22, 32, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 44, 45, 53, 57, 59, 61, 69, 75, 77, 79, 80, 81, 83, 86, 94, 106, and 108.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 18, 20, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28, 30, 31, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 43, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 54, 55, 56, 58, 60, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 76, 78, 82, 83½, 84, 85, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 107, 109, and 110; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$325,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out "60" and insert in lieu thereof "25;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out from the matter proposed to be inserted the word "thirteen" and insert in lieu thereof "seven;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out "75" and insert in lieu thereof "50;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out "300" and insert in lieu thereof "250;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 95, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out "81" and insert in lieu thereof "82;" and the Senate agree to the same.

JAMES B. BECK,
WILLIAM WINDOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JAMES H. BLOUNT,
J. A. McMAHON,
JAMES MONROE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is not a unanimous report. There is one question on which all the conferees did not agree. It will be noticed that one of the conferees on the part of the Senate has not signed the report. As the Senator from Kentucky has the bill in charge it would be better perhaps for him to state what the disagreement is, and I will then state to the Senate how I stand.

Mr. BECK. There is no disagreement; it is the final report of the committee of conference agreeing on the sundry civil bill. It is true that it is signed only by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] and myself on the part of the Senate. The Senator from West Virginia declined to sign the report, but it is signed by three House conferees and two Senate conferees. Therefore it is a report. It is precisely similar to the report made some hours ago which I explained on the floor of the Senate, with two exceptions. The House conferees receded from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 64, which reads thus:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to immediately charter or purchase, equip, and supply a vessel for the prosecution of a search for the steamer Jeannette of the arctic exploring expedition (which the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to undertake) and such other vessels as may be found to need assistance during said cruise, $175,000: Provided, That said vessel shall be wholly manned by volunteers from the Navy.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question? May I inquire whether this is the last appropriation bill?

Mr. BECK. The deficiency bill will be reported in a few moments.

Mr. CONKLING. This is the last appropriation bill? Of the deficiency bill I do not speak.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is a regular appropriation bill.

Mr. CONKLING. As my honorable friend from West Virginia takes me up on that I respectfully deny what he says. The deficiency bill is not an appropriation bill. But no matter about that; the appropriation bills, if I may understand, will all be completed with this bill, leaving nothing but the deficiency bill behind?

Mr. BECK. That is all, and this being a long bill, and as we desire to have it enrolled, I asked the Senator from New York to allow me to present the report.

The other amendment about which the conferees disagreed before, and the disagreement on which was reported, is numbered 106, which was to strike out this clause of the bill:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to the officers and employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual roll on the 1st day of July, 1880, one month's extra pay at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available.

Believing that not to be good legislation the conferees on the part of the Senate disagreed with the conferees on the part of the House and reported back the disagreement in regard to that amendment. The House conferees went back before their body. I am not at liberty to say what occurred there, but enough occurred to satisfy a majority of the conferees on the part of the Senate that if we attempted to change that in any regard the sundry civil bill would be a failure; and believing that the bill is too important to risk its absolute loss, a majority of the Senate conferees agreed to recede from the proposition of the Senate to strike out that clause and concur with the House, and we report that action to the Senate. That is the whole case.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As to the enrollment of the bill, that is going on now. There is but one amendment that has been disagreed to. It is well known that the enrolling clerks are at work upon the bill and if there is a question upon that one amendment, the enrollment of the bill will go on, and there is no danger of a failure of the bill for that reason, as I understand.

So far as the minority of the committee of conference is concerned, I think that it is improper to attempt upon an appropriation bill to undertake to advance salaries and pay the House employés for thirteen months in the year when the Senate employés are to be paid for twelve. I am not in favor of paying any employés thirteen months for twelve months' work, but all annual employés ought to be paid for twelve months. I start out with that proposition. My next point is that if the House employés are to have it, then the Senate employés ought to have it.

Mr. FARLEY. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question. How does the Senator say that he is opposed to paying the regular employés more than the annual salary, that is for more than one year, and yet turn around and say he would be willing to agree to it if the Senate employés could receive the same salary? Do I understand him to claim that two wrongs make a right?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is the opinion of the Senator from California. My opinions differ from his. I think the Senate employés are just as much entitled to this allowance as the House employés, and I believe if the employés of one body are to have it those of the other ought to have it. I have no idea that the House ought to insist upon paying their employés this extra compensation when they refuse to pay it to the Senate employés. For that reason I have been unable to agree with my colleagues on the committee of conference. If the House is going to regulate the salaries of their own employés, I believe they ought to let us regulate ours. We have always contended for it. They have never yielded. In the very last appropriation bill that we passed here—the legislative, executive, and judicial bill—they refused to allow two of our employés to be paid a few hundred dollars extra when the Senate had voted it to them.

But the main and whole question in this proposition is, Ought we to pay any employés for thirteen months in one year? My colleagues say that we ought to pay for thirteen months to the House employés and for twelve months to the Senate employés. I disagree with them, and I propose, as I said to them, to state to the Senate the position in which the matter stands, and let the Senate vote upon it. If the Senate is willing that we should recede from our amendment striking out the clause giving the month's extra pay for the House employés and agreeing that the Senate employés shall not have the extra pay, of course that will end the whole matter. I have no wish to prolong the discussion, but I should like to have the Senate express itself by a vote upon that point. I have, therefore, disagreed with my colleagues upon the committee so that the Senate may have an opportunity of voting whether it will agree to recede from the amendment which it had already voted, striking out the clause providing that the House employés borne upon the annual rolls may be given a month's extra pay. There is no difference in the conference upon the session or per diem employés; both Houses agree that they ought to have an extra month's pay, and they will get their extra month's pay; but these are annual employés. I shall be content with whatever the Senate may determine shall be done, but I believe it is best to insist on the action of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to say one word. The whole difficulty arises out of this state of facts: the Senate is more liberal to its employés than the House; it pays them better; and in order to make something like an equality the House has chosen to give its clerks one month's pay extra. I think that is perfectly right. I think each House ought to control absolutely its own domestic arrangements. I should consider it extremely discourteous on the part of the House if they should prescribe the pay of our employés here, and should undertake to interfere with them. Yesterday I voted against striking out the clause allowing the House to give to its employés an extra month's pay upon the ground that the House is the proper judge of what its employés are worth, and I felt no disposition to interfere in the matter; and I should not consent to have the House interfere with us. For that reason I voted yesterday for the appropriation made by the House for its own employés for one month's extra pay, because they do not pay them as much as we do. We are more liberal with our employés than the House is with its.

Mr. HEREFORD. I should like to ask my colleague the question, if it be a proper question, whether, when the new conference met on this bill, the proposition was made to the conferees on the part of the House in order to settle this matter amicably, that the Senate conferees would agree to pay the House employés for thirteen months if the House conferees would agree to a like proposition in regard to the Senate employés. I should like to know if that proposition was made, and if so what was the reply?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That matter was talked over in the conference, and I think the House conferees understood it perfectly; but no formal vote was taken. I stated half a dozen times that my position was that the employés of one body ought not to be paid the extra pay unless the employés of the other body also receive it; that they ought to go together. That is the reason why I have been unable to sign the conference report. I believe that is an answer to my colleague.

As to compensation, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] said that the Senate is more liberal to its employés than the House. That is the fact to some extent, in regard to messengers especially. We pay our messengers $1,440, while the House pays $1,200; but when you come to the principal clerks they get the same as ours. Taking the persons who occupy the desks there and those who occupy the desks here, I think the difference is in favor of the House clerks; that is, the House pays those employés more than ours receive. I have a list in my hand, and I will answer my friend on that point. Take the principal legislative clerk. Ours receives $2,592 and theirs receives $3,000. They have, of course, nothing to correspond to our executive clerk, but the minute and journal clerk of the House receives $3,000 and ours $2,592; and so five of their clerks get $3,000, while the corresponding clerks of the Senate receive $2,592. As to many of the employés of the two Houses the pay is about the same. There is more difference in the pay of the messengers than any others.

The Senate conferees have more than once said to the House conferees, "If you want to raise the salaries of your employés we will agree to it, and let you pay your employés whatever you desire, but we do not want it done in a roundabout way coming in at the end of the session to pay thirty days when you publish to the country that you pay your employés less than ours;" just as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] has said that the House pays its employés less than ours. That is the case to some extent; but, on the other hand, when you add a month's extra pay in an indirect way you pay the House employés more than the Senate employés receive.

It has been the position of the Senate, it is yet so far as I am concerned, that if the House had desired to pay their employés any amount, no matter how much so that it was in reason, the Senate conferees would not have objected to do it. We should be perfectly willing for them to do it, and we so said to the House conferees, and I have said it over and over again to the Appropriations Committee of the House.

Mr. BLAIR. How much does the Clerk of the House get?

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator means the Chief Clerk.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Taking the Secretary of the Senate and the corresponding officer of the House, their salaries are about even. I believe ours is a little less.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has not answered this one proposition, that the House has the right to regulate the pay of its own employés, and courtesy between the two Houses dictates that the House shall be allowed to do that. That is the point.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is not the point at all. The proposition of the House is not to regulate the pay, but it is to give an extra month's pay to the House employés. I have said to the Senator from Kentucky that the Senate conferees have said over and over again to the House conferees, "Make your salaries what you please, we will not call them into question; but when you come to do it in this roundabout way, by paying a month's extra salary to the employés of one House and not allowing the other body to do it, saying you will not agree that the Senate employés shall have it even though we pay it to our own employés," that is an inequality, and it is not right. But I am detaining the Senate too long. My friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] of course, will have something to say.

Mr. BECK. I have only to say that this is one of the most important bills that have come before Congress for consideration this session. Twenty-two million dollars are involved in the bill, in which great interests of the country are concerned. We made a fair and honest effort in endeavoring to get the House conferees to recede from what we thought was a bad proposition. The House conferees would not recede; the House sustained them; the bill is to be lost unless we agree with them; and I do not propose to lose a great bill like this because the House conferees have determined to do something that I think is not right. That is their business. If they are not able to regulate their own affairs, I cannot regulate them for them. I do not propose to do wrong because they do wrong; and I submit the matter to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think my colleague on the committee dwells a little too much upon the importance of passing this bill immediately. Of course it is important that it should be passed; we all agree that it ought to pass, it ought not to be lost; but the question before us is whether the Senate is now willing to concede that the House employés shall be paid an extra allowance and not the Senate employés.

Mr. BECK. Will my colleague on the committee answer me this question: Is he willing, if the House will agree to pay the Senate employés a month's extra pay, to pay the House employés a month's extra pay?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My friend knows that I have said so half a dozen times. This inequality is the great objection that I have to receding from the disagreement; but for that objection I would have been willing to sign the report. The question is whether the Senate wishes the House employés who are borne on the regular roll to have thirty day's extra pay and not the Senate employés. I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon concurring in the report.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WHYTE. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia whether he believes, if we do not concur in this report and insist, that we shall be able to get for the officers and employés of the Senate one month's extra pay?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I doubt that we shall, but I think the Senate ought to assert itself and say whether it desires the House employés to have thirty days' extra pay.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say that I am positively sure that we cannot do any better than we are doing now, and that we can get no more by delay.

Mr. WINDOM. I signed this report with the Senator from Kentucky because I thought it was quite too small a matter upon which to divide the two Houses and endanger the passage of the bill. What is the exact point at issue? The House provided that their annual employés should have one month's additional salary. The Senate disagreed to it. The committee recommended that disagreement, not upon the ground that the House had not the right to fix the compensation of its employés, but upon the manner by which it had accomplished it. Had the House increased the salaries of their employés to the amount mentioned in this provision, the Senate I apprehend would not have raised the question, for it has been discussed and for years has constituted a subject of disagreement between the two Houses, the Senate insisting upon its right under its own responsibility and in the exercise of its own judgment to fix the compensation of its employés. The House resisted it for a long time, but has substantially yielded that position to the Senate.

Then, how do we stand? The House has chosen in this bill to increase the compensation of its employés, not directly and as I think it ought to have been done, by increasing their pay if they do not receive pay enough, but in an indirect way, by giving them one month's extra pay which they had not earned, or at least for time they had not served. The question is, Can the Senate afford to disagree to this amendment and carry on a contest with the House, upon the manner that they propose to do the precise thing that we would have given permission to do if they had done it in a manner that better suits us? I think that is the question.

Mr. EATON. I want to ask a question of my friend from Kentucky in regard to one matter which I thought was of vital importance to the country. I think I may very properly go so far as to say that at the instance of the executive department of the Government, the Committee on Foreign Relations submitted an amendment to the Committee on Appropriations with regard to an embassy to a sister republic. We thought it was of vast importance to the country. I may go further and say that only a year or two ago action was had by the House of Representatives in favor of the measure; and now I am led to understand that by the report of the committee of conference there is no chance for an agreement between the conferees of the Senate and the House. I do not propose to say, so far as we are permitted to do it, that the bill ought to be lost unless there is an agreement in favor of that measure, but I certainly am led to say, from everything that I have heard from the other House, as well as the executive department, that this matter ought to have been agreed to in conference.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Connecticut will allow me to say that the House conferees refused to agree to the amendment to which he has referred. While I am up I desire to say further that they refused to agree to very many things that we thought were highly meritorious and necessary, but we were in conference; the hour was late. The Senate will observe it is now half past one o'clock on Friday morning, and we are to adjourn to-day at twelve. We did not receive the bill from the House until Monday night. We anticipated it all we could; and Saturday night, Sunday, Sunday night, Monday night, Tuesday night, most of the members of the committee devoted themselves to the bill, and I never left the committee-room before twelve o'clock at night, and Wednesday night it was early Thursday morning when I got away.

Mr. CONKLING. Working on Sunday?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir; Sunday and all, I am sorry to say. We were obliged to be there all day Sunday; at least I was there, working with the clerk, and doing what I could to have the bill presented in a proper form. We presented all the amendments we had any hope whatever that the House would agree to; and we have done the very best we could. The bill has to be lost or passed now. I hope some better system will be adopted hereafter. I have urged it time and again. I said things I did not like to say about the action of a democratic House. I said them last summer on this floor. I do hope the Senate will assert itself hereafter, and claim its right to consider carefully all appropriation bills, which I am sure we are not able to do now under the prevailing system. It is not right. We had hundreds of amendments pressed before us with only a few minutes to consider things that would require hours and days to consider carefully.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question in regard to the item referred to by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations? That I know is one of the most important items in the bill. I presented it to the committee to the best of my ability, as the chairman will remember, and my impression is that such legislation passed the House. I wish to know if there is no means of securing an agreement between the two Houses by which that amendment of the Senate will not be lost?

Mr. BECK. I know of no means unless the Senator from Connecticut or the Senator from Texas will introduce a resolution now and, passing it in a minute, send it over to the House.

Mr. EATON. I want it understood that I object to the Senate receding from that amendment, although I have no hope of securing favorable action upon it now.

Mr. BAYARD. There is, I understand, but one point of difference between the conferees on the part of the Senate, the Senator from West Virginia differing with his associates. I understand that the point is the right of the House to control the compensation of their own officers. Before now when I have been a member of conference committees of the Senate I have insisted, and will insist in the future, upon the right and duty of each House according to its own discretion and under its own responsibility to the public to fix the question of the compensation of its own employés. We have insisted before now that we were the best judge of the labor to be performed and the manner of its performance by the officers of the Senate. We have claimed that we knew best the amount of their labors, and we have insisted in conference reports that the Senate had a right to adjust such compensation according to its own sense of justice, and we have left the House the right to judge of that for themselves.

I have never been willing to diminish the number of employés stated by a House committee to be necessary for the performance of their duties, because I thought they were the proper judges; and on the same principle I have insisted that the Senate had the right and the duty to limit the number and the pay of its own officers. The House may pass upon it in a certain sense, but it is sub modo, and that modus is the discretion of the Senate.

Therefore it is, that understanding this is simply a proposition by the House to add to the pay of its own employés, not amended by the Senate by including their own or changing their own, I propose to deal by the House precisely as I propose they shall be compelled to deal by us, which is, that they shall manage their own affairs.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Delaware is mistaken in supposing that there was no effort to get the House to agree that the Senate employés should be put on an equal footing.

Mr. BAYARD. I did not say the Senate conferees, I said the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. They are pretty close words, however. It is unfortunate that this question should come up right at the end of the session and on a bill of so much importance. I desire a vote of the Senate on the question; but upon the statement that the bill may be lost, and as one of my colleagues on the committee who has been in charge of the deficiency bill is ready to report, I ask leave by unanimous consent to withdraw the request for the yeas and nays, in order to let the Senate vote in the usual way on concurring in the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) If there be no objection, the order for the yeas and nays will be withdrawn. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the report of the committee of conference?

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5521) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and acts amendatory thereof.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 182) granting a pension to Mary A. Shemelia; and

A bill (S. No. 465) granting an increase of pension to George Smith.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2165) to amend section 2297 of title 32 of the Revised Statutes, relating to homestead settlers.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced, that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 1830) granting a pension to Peter Grattan; and

A bill (H. R. No. 7111) restoring the name of Andrew J. Pennel to the pension-roll.

HOMESTEAD SETTLEMENTS.

Mr. PLUMB submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2165) to amend section 2297 of title 32 of the Revised Statutes, relating to homestead settlers, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments to the bill; and agree to the same.

The report was concurred in.

SCHOOL LAND IN BURLINGTON, IOWA.

Mr. PLUMB. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4206) confirming and vesting the title to a certain tract of land in Burlington, Iowa, in the "independent school district" of said city, to report it favorably, without amendment. The bill corrects simply a description in a former act of Congress, donating a tract of land to Burlington, Iowa. The term "west" was used when the term "east" should have been used. The mistake was only recently discovered, and I ask that the bill be now considered.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It amends the act entitled "An act confirming the title to a tract of land in Burlington, Iowa," approved July 4, 1868, so as to read:

That all of the title of the United States in and to a certain tract of land in the city of Burlington, Des Moines County, in the State of Iowa, described as being west of lot No. 978, in said city, south of Valley street, east of Boundary street, and north of Market street, as laid down on the plat of said city, certified under the act of Congress of March 3, 1837, by William W. Conell and George Cubbage, commissioners, and now on file in the General Land Office, and which was originally reserved from sale by the United States and dedicated to public burial purposes, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed to and vested in the "independent school district" of said city, to be forever dedicated to and used by said school district for public-school purposes, and for no other purpose whatever.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALLACE. I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Pennsylvania announces that he rises to a privileged question. I hold the floor subject to that.

Mr. WALLACE. I submit to the Senate the report of the committee of conference on the deficiency bill, and I ask to have it read and adopted.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House No. 7251, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officer of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 9, 10, 11, 14, 17, 18, 22, 23, 24, 39, 40, 59, 60, 64, 75, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, and 84.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 7, 12, 13, 15, 19, 21, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 62, 63, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 76, and 78; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following: "For the legislative expenses of the Territory of Arizona, $6,150;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$600,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$100,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$30,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$330,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$150,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Add at the close of said amendment, as a new paragraph, the following: "To pay Edward F. Riggs for services in the stationery-room from and including November 10, 1880, to March 4, 1881, $276;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 77, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$400,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HARRIS. When I rose and was recognized by the Chair I supposed the bill in charge of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] had passed, and I rose for the purpose of asking the Senate to proceed to the consideration of another bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The bill mentioned by the Senator from Tennessee is still before the Senate, and the question is on the adoption of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I do not desire to occupy the floor.

Mr. PADDOCK. I want to appeal to the Senator from Mississippi to allow me to take up a resolution which was reported from the Committee on Appropriations this afternoon for the relief of a poor class of Government employés. It will not take two minutes to pass it.

Mr. CONKLING. I believe I had the floor, the Senator from Kentucky having asked me to yield to allow him to submit a report from a conference committee, and then other privileged reports having come in. I will yield however to the honorable Senator who wants to take up a resolution.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask unanimous consent, with permission of my friend from Mississippi, to take up Senate joint resolution No. 164.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 164) relating to the salaries of Government employés in the District of Columbia. It provides that all employés of the Government in the city of Washington shall be paid for the 4th day of March (Inauguration Day) and the 30th day of May, (Decoration Day,) 1881, as for other days on which they perform labor.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONDITION OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has the floor on the bill (H. R. No. 6061) to incorporate the Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator from New York yield to me for a moment while I ask the Senate——

Mr. LAMAR. I must object, and call for the regular order

Mr. KERNAN. I think we had better try to dispose of this bill as soon as we can, and then go to the Calendar of House bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole to the railroad bill, upon which the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has the floor.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from New York allow me to say that all the appropriation bills are now provided for, and if he will yield to me for a motion to adjourn until to-morrow at nine o'clock——

Several SENATORS. A recess.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not think my honorable friend ought to make it nine o'clock. If we are to get any rest at all, let us say ten.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Well, I move to take a recess until ten o'clock.

["No!" "No!"]

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from New York will yield, I know, for a statement of the condition of the appropriation bills. That condition is about this: the Senate has agreed to conference reports on all of the appropriation bills, but the House has not agreed to two of them. As soon as the agreement of the House is announced on those bills, the Senate may take a recess; but if the House should disagree and the Senate had taken a recess we should lose the bills.

Mr. CONKLING. What are the two bills?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The sundry civil bill and the deficiency bill, and those only.

Mr. CONKLING. We have just concurred with the House on the only point on which the Houses seriously differed upon the sundry civil bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That was one of the bills. The report on the other bill has not been presented to the House.

Mr. CONKLING. On the other bill I understand there is no real difference.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Not with the conferees, but the House may raise some difference.

Mr. CONKLING. If I may be allowed without being out of order, as I have the floor to make a remark or two, I wish to say this: of course the honorable Senator from West Virginia is right in theory. If something should happen by which the House should not act upon one of these bills without sending it back here, we ought to be here in order to act upon it; but that chance is so remote that it has never I believe in a like case been regarded. If the Senate now takes a recess until ten o'clock in the morning we come here with two hours left to us. The signatures of enrolled bills can certainly be announced to both of these bills, there being no further action in the Senate to be taken. We do not facilitate the House at all, and it is as certain as death or quarter day that the House will act on both these bills, so that I submit to my honorable friend that constitutes no reason why we should exhaust ourselves by staying here all night or any further portion of the night. We are perfectly safe as to these two bills and as to every other thing which the Senator refers to by taking a recess until ten o'clock in the morning, and I am very clear we ought to do it. If the Senator from Rhode Island wishes to take the sense of the Senate upon that, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. One word.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from New York will allow me to say, before the motion to adjourn or take a recess is put, that there are some other things here besides appropriation bills; not perhaps of the same importance, yet they are important. There are other bills here on the Calendar which have been favorably reported by the committees of the Senate which involve rights important to the few people who are interested in them; and even though we may be detained a few hours longer than is comfortable and agreeable, we can afford to endure that inconvenience in the performance of a solemn duty. I am opposed to a recess or adjournment until we have at least occupied all the time which we have a right to occupy under the Constitution in the effort to perform the duties that we owe to the people of this country; and I hope the Senate will neither take a recess nor adjourn until we have acted upon those bills which have been passed by the one House and which have met the approval of the committees of the other.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The appropriation bills have gone over to the House. I believe the probabilities are that within fifteen minutes, or half an hour at furthest, we shall ascertain their fate there. I take it for granted the conference reports will be agreed to, but until that time it will be very unwise, in my judgment, for the Senate to adjourn or take a recess. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will not press his motion until we hear from these appropriation bills.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I withdraw my motion. I will state that it is not my desire to defeat business, but I do believe that bills which have been delayed until this time of the session are of such a doubtful character as to make it proper and right for us not to allow them to go through. No private right will be harmed by stopping them. If rights are there, they can be considered at the next session; that is only next December, and then the friends of these bills can take them in hand early and get them through early in the session. The bills which have failed to become laws during the session should not be passed in such rapid haste in the last hours of the session. No rights are violated by passing over these bills.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am sorry to hear the Senator from Rhode Island talk about "this late day" for bills. There is a bill here that ought to be passed, which I tried at least half a dozen times to get up, days and days ago, but I could not get it up, though I tried.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that in my opinion there cannot be much merit in the bill, or it would have been taken up and passed before now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole to the bill in charge of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] to incorporate the Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company, and upon that the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CONKLING. I do.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi if he thinks there is any hope of getting the bill which he has charge of through the Senate with any prospect of concurrence in the amendments by the House; and, if not, to appeal to the Senator from Mississippi to allow it to be disposed of, so that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of other measures.

Mr. LAMAR. Will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator from Tennessee with unreserved candor. I would not have asked this consideration of this bill had I anticipated the character of this opposition which it has received. I was under the impression that with the acceptance of the amendments which had been suggested by gentlemen who opposed its consideration, it would not have detained this body so long in the discussion upon it.

I will state to the Senator from Tennessee that, in my opinion, if the bill were to pass now with these amendments there would scarcely be any chance for it to be considered and passed by the House of Representatives.

I thank the Senate for its patient consideration of the merits of this measure and the evident disposition upon the part of a majority of the body to pass the bill through, as evidenced in more than one or two votes; and I am willing, if it accords with the wishes of the friends of the bill, that it should be passed over informally. It depends entirely upon the representatives of the section whose commercial interests were principally involved in the passage of this measure, and if they will give their sanction to it, I am willing that the bill should be passed by.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I shall object to the bill being informally laid aside.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say that I appreciate the importance of the bill in charge of the Senator from Mississippi as much as that Senator can appreciate it, and should have been delighted to have seen it pass through both Houses of Congress and become a law. Believing, as I do, however, that it is impossible at this late hour of the session for it to become a law, even though the Senate should pass it, if the Senator from New York will yield to me for that purpose, I will move to postpone the pending and all prior orders, giving notice that if that motion shall prevail I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 6033.

Mr. HOAR. What is it?

Mr. HARRIS. A bill for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others, a bill which my friend from Massachusetts and I are both familiar with.

Mr. LAMAR. One word in reference to that motion, inasmuch as it comes from one of the most prominent friends and advocates of the measure which I am in charge of, and one who appreciates its importance as much as any other Senator on the floor. Under the conviction that he has expressed of the impossibility of its becoming a law and of the legislation being completed, I shall allow the question to be submitted to the Senate without any objection or discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield for the purposes of that motion?

Mr. CONKLING. I will yield in a moment, and in that moment I wish to disclaim, although I know not that it is imputed, any intention to resist the passage of the pending bill for the purpose of delay. The bill came here on the 22d of February, it seems. It was referred to a committee and reported back on the 1st of March, and when we came to act on it the committee which reported it, instead of commending and standing by the bill as it was in print, of its own accord introduced amendments which none of us not of the committee had seen. When those amendments had been acted upon and adopted there stood in the bill—and to that first my attention was directed—a section which afterward by I believe a unanimous vote was stricken out, and which seemed to me to offend the Constitution and to offend the principles of law. To that section I spoke and for one intended to terminate my connection with the matter there.

Subsequently my attention was called to several objections to the bill, which have not yet been stated—of course I am not going to state them—and the little part that I have had in this was simply because without thought or feeling as to who was concerned, or of location or regions to be affected by it, it seemed to me such an act, overthrowing as I supposed it did some of the general provisions of our system, ought not to be adopted. I therefore wish before yielding to the Senator from Tennessee, who, I believe, is one of the friends of the pending bill, to give to him and to all the residue of the Senate the assurance that no part of my purpose has been to discuss for the sake of consuming time or to put anything in the way of the passage of the bill except such substantial objections as I believed would at any time be proper to state.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. LAMAR. Just one word. I simply wish to say that I did not mean to suggest that there was any opposition made to this bill for purposes of delay. My remarks had no reference whatever to any one's motive.

With regard to the objections which have been made, I wish to state that I did not think they were valid or would have stood the test of analysis had there been time to have considered them and discussed them.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Legislature of Kansas by a very decided vote in both houses within a very few days has passed resolutions instructing my colleague and myself to suppprt an act for the incorporation of a railroad through the Indian Territory, and the people of my State deemed this subject of such importance that those resolutions were telegraphed to us in full, rather than that they should be left to the ordinary transmission through the mails. It is on this account that I have felt it to be my duty to resist the informal laying aside of this bill for any subject whatever. Of course if the Senate do not see fit they can vote it down, but I have felt it to be my duty in view of what has been done by the Legislature of my State to say this in order that my course might not be misunderstood.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The remarks of the Senator from Mississippi make it almost unnecessary for me to say anything as to my opposition to the bill. I certainly have not endeavored to make any captious opposition, and have consumed but very little time. My objection to the bill is a general one to the consideration of all bills of this nature and particularly at this time of the session. The bills are too important to be taken up and passed in haste. That is my objection; and I really believe as much as I believe anything that I do not know that there are ample provisions in the statutes, if taken in connection with the powers of the legislative authorities of the Indian Territory and adjoining States, to do exactly what this bill proposes to give the company the right to do. I think the State of Kansas could incorporate a railway company, which could do precisely the same things, if the authorities in the Indian Territory would allow the right to go through there. I am inclined to think so, but still I state that with diffidence because I am not a lawyer, and I certainly do not intend to cope with any gentlemen at this late hour of the session on any legal point.

Mr. LAMAR. No one will charge the Senator from Rhode Island with any captious objection. I simply wish to make one remark, and that is, that there will not be an inch of the territory of the State of Kansas that will be touched by this proposed railroad.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. TELLER. What is that motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To lay aside the pending and all prior orders with a view of taking up House bill No. 6033.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Do I understand that if this motion prevails the other bill of necessity comes up afterward?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not until the Senate votes upon it. The question is on the motion to postpone.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to state as a friend of this bill, because I believe it ought to pass, my judgment is that if the motion of the Senator from Tennessee prevails, and the bill is permitted to be passed by in the way proposed now, it is a final quietus to this bill for all time to come. Even if the bill does not pass the House, if the friends of the bill want to put it in shape to give it a respectable standing in the next Congress, they had better put the bill on its passage, and let it either pass or be defeated.

Mr. HARRIS. I am apprehensive that the next Congress is not going to be controlled very much by our action or our non-action, and with the hour-hand pointing to the hour of two upon that clock this morning, with diverse and sundry amendments already voted upon the bill, to proceed further with its consideration is but an idle waste of time, as every Senator must recognize. While I and the people that I have the honor to represent here are as much interested in the bill of the Senator from Mississippi as that Senator himself can be interested, I persist in the motion to postpone the pending and all prior orders with a view of attending to practical legislation which can result in something.

Mr. LAMAR. I must say that I think a continuance of the consideration of this bill, and even its passage, will subserve no interest, and that it will simply delay the consideration of other matters that demand action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to postpone the present and all prior orders.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. Now I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 6033.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Before that question is put I should like to make a statement. I have stood by the bill which has just been disposed of. I was one of the committee who reported it, stood by it, but I thought it would not go through both Houses. I have a bill here that is represented as being of very great importance that I should like to have action taken on. It is a House bill, and if acted upon here according to the bill as it is reported can become a law. I therefore ask to have it taken up.

Mr. HOAR. Let that be read for information.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I should like to have a letter read which has been sent to me.

Mr. HARRIS. I believe the business in order is my motion to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 6033.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the motion.

Mr. HARRIS. It is not competent for me to argue the merits of that bill on my motion to proceed to its consideration. I shall therefore object to the argument of the merits of any other bill or the reading of any letter or communication which tends to show the merits of any other bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. What is the bill the Senator proposes to take up?

Mr. HARRIS. House bill No. 6033, for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am opposed to that.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Nebraska wants a letter read for the information of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Tennessee desires no information on that subject at this time, however ready and happy he will be to have the information at another time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 6033.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I object to taking up that bill when there are bills I think of much more importance than that.

Mr. HARRIS. Mine is a motion, and not an asking of unanimous consent. The Senator may object and vote against it; but I beg that my motion be put.

Mr. TELLER. It is debatable.

Mr. CONKLING. It is debatable on everything but the merits.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Nebraska has not touched the merits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I know nothing particularly of the merits of that bill; I do not propose to enter into the merits of it, but I do know the merits of others; therefore I am very sure that there are other bills which are equal in importance to that at any rate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am not through yet. The bill that I was trying to speak to, but the Senator would not allow me, it is not my purpose to discuss the merits of, but I hope I may be allowed to state its importance to his community as well as mine. This bill probably concerns more people than any other bill that has been acted on within the last week except the deficiency bill. It is the bill in relation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company. A man might make money if he would go out into that country in order to raise cattle——

Mr. McDONALD rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SAUNDERS. What is the object of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McDONALD. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me to make a suggestion——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska allow the Senator from Indiana to make a suggestion?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will hear my friend.

Mr. McDONALD. My suggestion is to allow the Senator from Tennessee to have his bill taken up, and then I think the Senator from Tennessee will consent and so will the Senate to lay it aside informally for the purpose of considering the bill which the Senator from Nebraska refers to. I wish to say in reference to that bill that it is a House bill which was passed on the regular call upon an objection made by me, and my objection was principally to the amendment which the Senate committee had reported to it and which I understand the friends of the bill are now very willing shall be voted down. I have certainly no objection to the passage of that bill as it came from the House.

Mr. HOAR. What is the bill about?

Mr. McDONALD. It is in reference to the Utah and Northern Railway Company. I suggest that the bill of the Senator from Tennessee be taken up and that then he yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me?

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator will allow the question to be taken on my motion to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 6033.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana holds the floor by the courtesy of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am perfectly willing so far as I am concerned to accept the proposition made by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by me, and when——

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his point of order.

Mr. HOAR. That the motion is not in order. The Senator from Tennessee is not in order as long as the Senator from Nebraska holds the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. Unless he holds the floor with the consent of the Senator from Nebraska. The Senator from Massachusetts was right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee had already made that motion, and it was upon that that the Senator from Nebraska yielded the floor and now holds it.

Mr. HOAR. So I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. PADDOCK. That is the question my colleague is discussing.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Now, if the Senator from Tennessee will consent——

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Nebraska desires to hold the floor and talk about it all night, I will never consent to anything.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If I had talked one-tenth of the time that has been talked by the Senator from Tennessee he might make such a remark. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please come to order.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have been quite a modest man I think about talking. [Laughter.] I am not going to take up time; but I will insist that we vote down the motion of the Senator from Tennessee in order to take up the other bill, because I believe it is of more importance than any other thing that will probably come before the Senate between now and the adjournment. I am in earnest about that, and therefore will take no further time, but will ask that the vote be taken, and first I hope the Senate will refuse to agree to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senate will not adopt the motion. This is a proposition to revise certain assessments by which the rebel sympathizers in the Senator's State——

Mr. HARRIS. I raise the question of order that the Senator from Massachusetts has no right to argue the merits of this question upon a motion to take it up.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Would it not be in order to take up the bill I propose?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I thought I had. I had not yielded the floor. My feet are tolerably large, and I will hold it. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was of opinion that the Senator from Nebraska yielded the floor, but if the Chair is mistaken the Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I was asking the Chair whether it would be in order for me to state the nature and character of the bill which I have proposed to antagonize with the bill that has been proposed to be called up by the Senator from Tennessee. I want to state then that the bill simply authorizes the Utah and Northern Railway Company to build a branch or branches connecting with their main line. I know I shall be met by some one saying that the Territory might authorize the same thing; but the Legislatures in these Territories meet only once in two years; the sessions are biennial; and it will be a year before they are in session again. There are two or three lines, one or two at any rate, of great importance which ought to be built this year to connect with certain mines. If the Senate will allow the letter to be read which I sent to the Clerk's desk, it will show the importance of this matter in such a way that I believe the Senate will take up the bill in a moment. Now, I ask that that letter be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that under the rule time is limited for debate on a motion to take up a bill, and the Senator's time has been exhausted under the rule adopted February 8, 1881. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to take up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. PLUMB called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska moves to lay the motion of the Senator from Tennessee on the table.

Mr. PLUMB. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAMPTON, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] but as I do not regard this as a political question I shall vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. WHYTE, (after voting in the negative.) This vote appears to be political in its character, and as I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] on political questions, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HARRIS. Clearly a political question; every republican votes one way and every democrat the other.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Anthony,	Ferry,	Logan,	Rollins,
Baldwin,	Hill of Colorado,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Blair,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Teller,
Burnside,	Ingalls,	Paddock,	Windom.
Conkling,	Kellogg,	Platt,
Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Plumb,

NAYS—29.

Bailey,	Eaton,	McDonald,	Voorhees,
Bayard,	Farley,	McPherson,	Walker,
Beck,	Garland,	Maxey,	Wallace,
Butler,	Hampton,	Pendleton,	Williams,
Call,	Harris,	Saulsbury,	Withers.
Cockrell,	Hereford,	Slater,
Coke,	Jonas,	Vance,
Davis of W. Va.,	Kernan,	Vest,

ABSENT—24.

Allison,	Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Georgia,	Pugh,
Blaine,	Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Randolph,
Booth,	Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Brown	Groome,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Bruce,	Grover,	Lamar,	Thurman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hamlin,	Morgan,	Whyte.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] recorded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He is recorded in the negative.

Mr. HARRIS. The reason I asked the question was because I had agreed to pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] on all political questions. The result is not changed at all by that vote, but I asked the Senator from Missouri to pair with the Senator from Wisconsin upon this particular matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri withdraws his vote. It does not change the result.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire, then, to say that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] is paired on this question with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.] The Senator from Wisconsin would vote "yea," if present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion made by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 1114) granting a pension to Luman Case; and

A bill (S. No. 972) granting a pension to Mrs. Anna I. Guest.

The message also announced that the House agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 365) for the relief of Hardie Hogan Helper;

A bill (H. R. No. 1650) for the relief of Edward T. Brownell;

A bill (H. R. No. 4905) to declare the true intent and meaning of an act to reimburse the State of Kentucky for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion, approved June 8, 1872;

A bill (H. R. No. 4438) for the relief of William Redus;

A bill (H. R. No. 5521) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and acts amendatory thereof;

A bill (H. R. No. 6034) for the relief of the personal representative of George W. Henderlite, deceased;

A bill (H. R. No. 6360) for the relief of William H. Davis; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6478) for the relief of Levi Price.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. VANCE. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, the Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VANCE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAMPTON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 27, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Baldwin,	Garland,	Maxey,	Vance,
Bayard,	Groome,	Morrill,	Vest,
Beck,	Hereford,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hoar,	Ransom,	Wallace,
Dawes,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,	Whyte,
Farley,	Kernan,	Saunders,	Withers.
Ferry,	McPherson,	Slater,

NAYS—8.

Bailey,	Call,	Coke,	Lamar,
Burnside,	Cockrell,	Harris,	McDonald.

ABSENT—40.

Allison,	Conkling,	Johnston,	Plumb,
Anthony,	Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Florida,	Pugh,
Blaine,	Eaton,	Jones of Nevada,	Randolph,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Rollins,
Booth,	Grover,	Kirkwood,	Sharon,
Brown,	Hamlin,	Logan,	Teller,
Bruce,	Hampton,	McMillan,	Thurman,
Butler,	Hill of Colorado,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Georgia,	Paddock,	Williams,
Cameron of Wis.,	Ingalls,	Platt,	Windom.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) There is no quorum voting.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The appropriation bills have all been disposed of, and it is suggested by many of the Senators around me that it would be well to take a recess until some hour in the morning.

Mr. HAMPTON. I rise, Mr. President, to ask the opinion of the Chair as to what constitutes a quorum of the Senate at present?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-eight constitutes a quorum as the Chair is advised.

Mr. HAMPTON. I have a right to vote to make a quorum. I propose to do so if my vote will make a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The result having been announced, a vote cannot now be received.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator cannot vote after the result has been announced.

Mr. WHYTE. A roll-call is the only thing in order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Is it in order to move a recess, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will entertain the motion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move a recess until half past nine in the morning.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Chair hold that it is in order to move to take a recess with less than a quorum? It would be in order to adjourn; but how about a recess?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Rhode Island to ask if it was in order to move to adjourn.

Mr. BURNSIDE. My question was whether it was in order to move a recess.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senate adjourns now it adjourns for good; it is a sine die adjournment.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have not made a motion to adjourn. My motion was for a recess until this morning at half past nine.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest that by common consent, as there is a quorum present, the roll-call be taken again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is nothing in order but a call of the house or a motion to adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move a call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll of Senators.

The roll was called and 43 answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I now move that the Senate take a recess until this morning at half past nine o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM. I move that the Senate proceed now to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. CONKLING called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Bailey,	Farley,	Lamar,	Vest,
Baldwin,	Ferry,	Maxey,	Walker,
Bayard,	Garland,	Morrill,	Wallace,
Beck,	Groome,	Pendleton,	Whyte,
Butler,	Harris,	Platt,	Williams,
Cockrell,	Hereford,	Ransom,	Withers.
Coke,	Hoar,	Saulsbury,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Slater,
Dawes,	Kernan,	Vance,

NAYS—3.

Burnside,	Eaton,	McDonald.

ABSENT—39.

Allison,	Conkling,	Jones of Florida,	Pugh,
Anthony,	Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Nevada,	Randolph,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Rollins,
Blair,	Grover,	Kirkwood,	Saunders,
Booth,	Hamlin,	Logan,	Sharon,
Brown,	Hampton,	McMillan,	Teller,
Bruce,	Hill of Colorado,	McPherson,	Thurman,
Call,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Paddock,	Windom.
Cameron of Wis.,	Johnston,	Plumb,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move a call of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. That is not in order.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee will state his question of order.

Mr. BAILEY. It is whether it is competent for gentlemen to call for the yeas and nays who refuse to vote in answer to the call, whether the President can recognize a call for the yeas and nays by persons not present as evidenced by the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call for the yeas and nays precedes the evidence of their being present or not present.

Mr. EATON. My friend from Tennessee is entirely out of order. There is only one course to pursue, and that is for the Chair to pursue his course and call the roll.

Mr. BAILEY. I recognize that. I want simply to call attention to the fact that Senators who call for the yeas and nays refuse to answer to their names. That is my purpose; that is all.

Mr. EATON. The only thing in order is a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and forty Senators responded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty Senators having answered to their names there is a quorum present, and the question recurs on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. I renew the motion to take a recess until half past nine. It is absolutely certain nothing will be gained by a series of roll-calls.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the motion of the Senator from North Carolina the Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate take a recess.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask permission of the Senate to make a remark which is entirely out of order without unanimous consent. If nobody objects I wish to state for myself that I understand that some Senators wish an executive session to act upon matters touching which I have a right to presume there will be no contest. To that, it seems to me, no one will object; certainly I do not. But if, on the other hand, the executive session be wished in order that now at three o'clock in the morning, in the absence of so many Senators, contested matters are to be acted upon, I, for one, will resist that motion and resist that purpose until the minute-hand reaches twelve to-morrow.

If we can have an understanding that we go into executive session to dispose of such matters (I have no right to allude to them) as involve no objection and debate, all can be done in a few moments.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall object. I shall demand as a member of this Senate if we go into executive session that we go there unconditioned and uncontrolled. I shall object to any arrangement of that kind.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Delaware was very careful to ask me to yield, which I did with great pleasure, and I beg his pardon for interrupting him; but as I have the floor by unanimous consent I would simply conclude my observations by saying that I made this suggestion in the hope that it would preserve the rights of all and consist with the feelings of all. If I might assume as I thought I had a right to that nobody would wish to seek any advantage growing out of the hour of the night, I have only to say that if any Senator wishes to have acted upon in executive session a contested case in the absence of so many Senators, that case shall never be finally acted upon if I have the power within the rules of the Senate on my responsibility as a Senator to prevent it—never until the hammer falls to-morrow.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I wish to say that if we go into executive session I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the calendar and dispose of the cases in the order in which they stand. Of course I have no right to allude to any cases, but I shall ask that, because I think cases that have been here for many weeks should be acted upon, and I shall object to any arrangement by which certain cases are taken up and others passed by.

Mr. EATON. If Senators will permit me for one moment, I think we ought to go into executive session for this and for this only: There is before the Senate an important matter in which two nations are concerned, this nation and China; and if we go in at all I shall move the very moment we get there that we take up the treaties that have been by the commissioners of the two States arranged, and not any little petty nomination. That will be what I shall do.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senate is now nearly at a dead-lock and no business can be done. Let us have a compromise. I think it is useless to waste time in this way. I sympathize with the junior Senator from New York in the appointments that he speaks of; if we were in executive session I should vote for them; I am willing to say that in open session, but we cannot get into executive session. I have voted twice in the negative with a view to make a quorum, but we cannot go on this way all night, and I think it would be wise to take a recess or go into executive session with the understanding that only unobjected cases should be considered. We have not the time to consider the contested cases, but we had just as well look the matter in the face sensibly as not. If we remain in the condition we are now none of the cases will be acted upon, and a great many very worthy cases will be neglected and passed over. I think we had just as well look the matter in the face as not. I have voted twice, as the Senator from New York knows, in the negative, so as to feel that I was not obstructing business. I do not mean to criticise those who have not voted, because they are on my side of the Chamber and I vote with them as a rule on all questions of importance; but seeing a dead-lock now, I must be governed in the future by what I think to be right to my side of the Chamber. I do not think that any contested cases can be confirmed by the Senate. That is my deliberate opinion, and in view of that fact I ask that we go into executive session to take cognizance of the unobjected cases, or else take a recess until to-morrow at half-past nine; I do not care which.

Mr. KERNAN. Only a moment. The Senate will bear witness that for weeks and weeks in a proper, and, as I think, a moderate and modest way I have asked that we proceed to the consideration of executive business. It was with a view of disposing of cases, if they were contested cases, when there was time. When it comes, now so long as I am a member of the Senate, which will be but a very few hours, I shall, for one, vote against any course of action that will enable any one to get up and say, "If you attempt to act on that case it will be resisted until it is too late to act upon any." My judgment is that we owe it to ourselves and to our committees, and that the proper course of action is when we do go into executive session to take up the cases in their order, and that a case that it is said is to be contested is not to be forever postponed lest that should cost us some time and labor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to go into executive session, the Senator from Massachusetts has moved that the Senate take a recess until half past nine o'clock.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to make a remark. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will withdraw his motion. There are Senators here who have been patiently waiting and doing their part to pass bills that have been passed by the House. There are several bills yet undisposed of, which I suppose will not excite any difference of opinion or any opposition, which have had no opportunity of being considered. Inasmuch as it is impossible that there should be any great discussion at this time, I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bills on the Calendar that have not been objected to. If any of them provoke discussion of any length it may be abandoned. There are some pension bills. The Senator from Indiana has a pension bill where the people are very old and probably will not live to another session of Congress. I have a bill in charge which is not a pension bill, but I suppose will not take long. I would ask, therefore, that the pending motion be withdrawn and that we go on with House bills of that kind.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will state to the Senator from Florida that I have made no motion whatever.

Mr. CALL. I beg pardon.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I made no motion; the Senator from Massachusetts made it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the Senate take a recess until half past nine to-morrow.

Mr. THURMAN. That is not the proper form in which to make that motion. "Half past nine o'clock to-morrow" will be when?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair added "to-morrow" without reflection. The motion is to take a recess until half past nine o'clock.

Mr. THURMAN. We can sit, according to the usage of the Senate, up to noon to-morrow, but it is all in legislative parlance Thursday. The right way is to move to take a recess for so many hours.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is that the Senate take a recess until half past nine o'clock.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move to amend that by saying a recess of six and a half hours.

Mr. THURMAN. That is the right way. Now, Mr. President, I wish to say one word about this.

I really do not perceive the force of the remarks made by some of our friends on the left, that if we go into executive session we must go there to take up the calendar just as it stands and proceed with the cases whether there is objection or whether there is no objection. We do not do so with our legislative Calendar. The Senator from Florida has just proposed what we have done again and again, that we call the Calendar of House bills only, and then only take up such as there is no objection to. One of the rules under which we act and under which we have passed more bills than in any other way whatever, the well-known rule called the Anthony rule, provides for that very thing; a single objection stops a bill.

We have a very few brief hours left. I cannot say what business is pending before the Senate in executive session; but it is to be assumed from what has been said that there are cases to which objections are made, contested cases, and cases to which there is no objection. If we go into executive session, why should we not do precisely what we do with the legislative Calendar, passing on those cases where there is no objection and letting the others go by? I see nothing unfair in that; I see nothing that deprives any Senator of his right in that. We do it every day for an hour and a half under the Anthony rule with our legislative Calendar, and it seems to me to be a perfectly fair proposition that we should do the same thing with the executive calendar.

The appropriation bills are all through with, and I am perfectly willing to take a recess. I think perhaps that is just as well as any other course; but there are Senators who want certain business done in executive session, and who can have their wishes gratified if we will agree to do that to which no Senator has any objection.

Mr. BAILEY. I have only a little time to remain in the Senate, but I would be perfectly willing for any action to be taken, if it were not for a threat that has been uttered by a Senator on this floor to the effect that he intends, whatever may be the will of the Senate, whatever may be the wishes of his equals on this floor, whatever their conception of duty in regard to nominations to be made, to defeat and thwart that action, although it may take him until to-morrow at twelve o'clock. For that reason, and for that reason alone, I think that it is consistent with the dignity and the duty of the Senate to take its own course in regard to this matter; and therefore I move again that we shall go into executive session.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire whether the Senator from Tennessee refers to me?

Mr. BAILEY. I refer to the Senator from New York who, but a little while ago, made that threat.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator asserts with some positiveness that I made a threat, and rather than simply to deny that I did I will restate myself. I said, and I repeat deliberately, understandingly, and ready to accept all of its responsibilities, that if certain members of this body will refuse at this hour in the morning, in the absence of so many Senators on this side to do as we usually do, and as the honorable Senator from Ohio has so well stated, and will seek (I say nothing about motives; I said nothing before about motives) an advantage growing out of the hour and out of the absence of Senators on this side to do that which with a full Senate could not be done, I will as a Senator say (I said before) under the rules of the Senate, as far as they permit me to do so, resist the consummation of that action until twelve o'clock to-day.

That is no threat. That is no statement for which the Senator from Tennessee has any right to arraign me. It is, on the contrary, that privilege, that duty, guaranteed to the minority, recorded in the rules of the Senate and cherished in all parliamentary bodies. I deny that it is a threat, and I repel whatever of imputation is conveyed in its being so characterized by the Senator from Tennessee.

I add one further remark. While I am honored with a seat in this body never knowingly will I defy the rules of the Senate; never will I transcend them; never will I do, even in resisting what I may deem an unfair advantage, anything save that which the rules of the Senate reserve to me as a member of the minority as the shield against aggression.

Mr. BAILEY. The nominations which have been made to the Senate have been made by a President who was voted for by the Senator from New York, belonging to the same political party, and surely the Senators who are in the majority in this body have no particular interest in either confirming or rejecting them. Although the Senator from New York spoke of the power of the majority of the Senate, and thereby intimated that the majority is a democratic majority, surely he must remember that every nomination that has been made by the President is a nomination of some person who belongs to his party and not to ours.

Mr. CONKLING. I should remember it if I knew it; but as I do not know it I cannot remember it.

Mr. BAILEY. I object not to the interruption. Surely the Senator knows the fact to be so. If he does not, I can say that so far as I am concerned I believe that every nomination which has been made has been made from one of the Senator's own party, one who would rally to his support if he were to-day a candidate for any great office in the country, one who would support him heartily and cheerfully. So we have no concern with that. The affairs of this Government must be conducted. Since I have been a member of the Senate I have been always willing to assist the Chief Executive, (one of the Senator's choice, voted for by him, not by me, resisted by me, but placed in office by himself and those who were associated with him,) in the administration of the affairs of this Government.

So there is nothing in all that the Senator says about a majority. Where is the minority? The minority, sir, is in accord with the President of the United States. The minority should be in accord with him who has made these nominations. I understood the Senator to say, and to say here in open session, that if we should go into executive session he would by every possible parliamentary means undertake to defeat any nomination that was disputed; I suppose, disputed by himself. Undoubtedly, unquestionably, the Senator from New York has the right to do that; no man can question his right to do that; but I speak of the threat that he made.

It was a threat. It was understood by every Senator upon this floor to be a threat that, "If you shall go into executive session, by every parliamentary means that is known to parliamentary law I will resist every effort that shall be made to confirm those to whom I object or who may be objected to by others." What does that mean? It is a threat, as I understand it. It is a threat, I think, as the Senate understand it. "You may go into executive session if you will, but if you do, your efforts will be of no avail." For that reason I called attention to it, and I do now again call attention to it.

In my judgment, the threat that has been made by the Senator should be resisted by the Senate of the United States, for this is a body of equals. However we may be inferior in point of ability one to another; however humble we may be in comparison with other gentlemen, we are here the representatives of the States of this Union, and each man in virtue of his position upon the floor of the Senate is the peer of every other Senator here. If we go into executive session, we shall go into it as we ordinarily have done, for the purpose of transacting the business that is before us, and is to be performed in the discharge of a public duty. If parliamentary methods may be used there in executive session, where the public will be excluded, in order to defeat certain nominations, let it be done there; but let no threats be made here. Let it be understood that we have no autocrat, that we have no one here who can dominate over and control the Senate of the United States.

I trust the Senate will go into executive session and permit the Senator from New York or any other Senator to employ all his ability, to bring into use every parliamentary method, to defeat nominations which may be considered there; but let no such threat as that go out to the country. For myself I defy such threats. I say they will have no influence upon me; I trust they will have no influence upon the minds of the Senators who are present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will read the rule, which will be rigidly enforced hereafter:

43. * * * And the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to executive business, and to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] to take a recess.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. What is pending now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, which is not debatable.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the motion.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAMPTON, (when his name was called.) I have heretofore announced my pair with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] except that I can vote if my vote is necessary to make a quorum.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to Rules 16 and 17.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not in order now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is exactly in order.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senate is dividing. I demand the regular order.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the Clerk report the negative vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote is being taken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The rule requires that after the roll is called and before the vote is announced proceedings shall be taken in regard to those who decline to vote.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the Clerk report the persons who voted in the negative, and then I want Rule 17 read and enforced.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Rules 16 and 17.

The SECRETARY. No one has voted in the negative.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will state his question of order.

Mr. CONKLING. My point of order is that the Senate is dividing. The roll has been called; the names have been read, and I demand the announcement of the vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I deny the right to announce the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order has been made——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call the attention of the Senate and of the Presiding Officer to Rule 17.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will please cease his remarks until the Chair determines the question of order.

Mr. THURMAN. Let the Chair decide.

Mr. CONKLING. It is not debatable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let Rule 17 be read, and it will be seen that I am correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will direct the reading of Rule 17. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

When a Senator, being present and declining to vote when his name is called, shall be required to assign his reasons therefor, and shall so assign them, the Presiding Officer shall thereupon submit the question to the Senate: "Shall the Senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?" which shall be decided without debate. And these proceedings shall be had after the roll shall have been called and before the result of the vote is announced; and any further proceedings by the Senate in reference thereto shall be after such announcement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I insist on the enforcement of that rule.

Mr. CONKLING. Now let us hear the Chair rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules upon this question in accordance with what has been ruled, as the present occupant of the chair understands, for the past six years, that you cannot compel a Senator to vote.

Mr. THURMAN. Then we ought to abolish the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We can certainly compel a Senator to vote who refuses to vote.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. Is debate in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state further——

Mr. HARRIS. The Chair can enforce the rule even though he cannot force a Senator to vote.

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all.

Mr. HARRIS. It is the duty of the Chair, under the plain literalism of this rule, to have the names of Senators present who failed to vote called in order that they may assign the reasons why they did not vote, and put the question whether they shall be excused.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Is debate in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot decide the presence or absence of Senators except as they answer to the roll-call.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is wrong.

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Chair not recognize the fact that the Senator from New York who raises the question of order is present? If not present he could not raise the question of order; and if present he is present, and the Chair must know he is present, if he entertains the question of order raised by the Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from New York calls the Senator from Tennessee to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is out of order.

Mr. CONKLING. And insists that this motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is not in order, and no other Senator is in order.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well; that is what I say.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Chair decides that when proceedings are to be taken for the excuse of Senators or for their censure, if we can censure them without having previously established any rule on the subject, and that there is no debate on such a matter as that, I most respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair. This is a very singular proceeding. It grew out of the fact that some years ago some Senators, and I confess I was one of them, refused to vote. When we were mentioned by name and a Senator demanded that we should give our reasons for not voting, we sat still. Nothing came of that. Then came this rule upon the revision of the rules, that these proceedings should take place before the vote was announced, but there is nothing in it which says that a Senator is to be tried and convicted and sentenced without debate. I say, therefore, that if any one names a Senator here and requires the Chair to ask why he did not vote and to give his excuse for not voting, that is a debatable question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Am I to understand——

Mr. INGALLS. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio a question——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will answer the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask if the Senator thinks the Chair has a right to call upon any Senator to assign his reasons without an order of the Senate?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly not.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not remember exactly the language of the rule, but I would say that the Chair can. Will the Chair have the rule read again?

Mr. CONKLING. I wish the Chair to read Rule 40.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Rule 17 is as follows:

When a Senator, being present and declining to vote when his name is called, shall be required to assign his reasons therefor, and shall so assign them, the Presiding Officer shall thereupon submit the question to the Senate: "Shall the Senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?" which shall be decided without debate. And these proceedings shall be had after the roll shall have been called and before the result of the vote is announced; and any further proceedings by the Senate in reference thereto shall be after such announcement.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Chair now read Rule 40?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read Rule 40.

Mr. CONKLING. Simply to show that no debate is in order now.

Mr. EATON. Rule 40 does not apply to this question at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All this is being done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONKLING. I object to it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate take a recess for six hours.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not in order. Rule 40 is as follows:

A question of order may be raised at any state of the business, except when the Senate is dividing, and, when raised, shall be decided by the Presiding Officer, without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate; or he may submit any question of order for the decision of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I demand the execution of that rule.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule upon this question, and then if any appeal is taken the question will be submitted to the Senate, and it is the only way that business can be conducted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is this: I understand that the decision of the Chair is that Rule 17 is no rule at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is that a parliamentary inquiry, the Chair will ask?

Mr. EATON. I propose, in the very best temper in the world, to reduce this matter to a proper point. The suggestion of my friend from New York that Rule 40 should be read does not apply to this question, as I will show in a moment if it is necessary. We are now under Rule 17, which is this:

When a Senator, being present and declining to vote when his name is called, shall be required to assign his reasons therefor, and shall so assign them, the Presiding Officer shall thereupon submit the question to the Senate.

In order to test the whole question about Rule 17 and Rule 40, I move that the Senator from New York shall assign his reasons for not voting when his name was called.

Mr. THURMAN. That is the right way to bring it up.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order, saying meanwhile to my friend that I will assign my reasons whenever the Senate, thereby meaning the quorum, direct me to do so. I have heard the Senator's motion put and tested in this body before, and I am very well prepared for it, I think; but first I insist upon the Chair ruling on the question of order which is before it, and which the rule declares shall be decided without debate. What the honorable Senator from Connecticut can do after that is another question, but when a question of order is raised it must be decided and without debate. I ask respectfully for that decision.

Mr. EATON. One word.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator is out of order.

Mr. EATON I beg pardon.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the question submitted to the Chair. I ask the Chair to rule whether the Senator is out of order or not.

Mr. EATON. That is the very question I propose the Chair shall rule upon.

Mr. CONKLING. So do I.

Mr. EATON. Very well; then hear me one moment.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to hear the Chair.

Mr. EATON. The Senator had better hear me first.

Mr. CONKLING. I would rather hear the Chair.

Mr. EATON. I would rather be heard.

Mr. CONKLING. I know the Senator would; but I would rather hear the Chair.

Mr. EATON. This matter might as well be decided properly.

Mr. BAYARD. Read Rule 16 first.

Mr. EATON. I will take first Rule 16:

When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Senators present, each Senator, when his name is called, shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly and without debate his assent or dissent to the question.

Then comes Rule 17. We will see whether the question of order can be interposed until after another matter is determined:

17. When a Senator, being present and declining to vote when his name is called, shall be required to assign his reasons therefor, and shall so assign them, the Presiding Officer shall thereupon submit the question to the Senate.

I have required, under this rule, that the Senator from New York shall assign his reasons for not voting, and no question of order can be interposed.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my friend allow me to point out his error?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. It consists in this: he has required me; but the Senator is not the Senate.

Mr. EATON. I ought to be so far as this question is concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule that this discussion is out of order; and for information the Chair will have read a compilation of the action of the Senate so far as the Chair can obtain in regard to it.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Chair allow me to suggest——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent it can be done.

Mr. HARRIS. Rule 17 has been changed since that compilation.

Mr. CONKLING. The regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRIS. Rule 17 is not what it was.

Mr. CONKLING. I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will order the compilation to be read by the Clerk.

Mr. BAYARD. At what page?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At page 24.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The yeas and nays are ordered and the roll is being called; several Senators when their names are called make no response. A Senator inquires of the Chair [Mr. CARPENTER] when would it be proper for him to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that several Senators sitting in their seats when their names were called by the Secretary had refused to vote? The Chair [Mr. CARPENTER] ruled that the roll-call could not be interrupted by other proceedings; but that after that was finished and the names of the Senators voting had been read over by the Secretary, and before the announcement of the result, the question raised by the Senator would be in order. Mr. THURMAN appealed from this ruling of the Chair; and after debate (Congressional Globe, February 23, 1871, 1602,) the Chair reversed his decision, and ruled that no motion or other proceedings could be interposed between the calling of the yeas and nays and the announcement of the vote.—Senate Journal, Third Session Forty-first Congress, 335, and Congressional Globe, 1602.

NOTE.—The rulings of the Chair and the action of the Senate upon this question are confused and unsatisfactory.

Mr. THURMAN. That ruling, I remember it very well, was made before this Rule 17 was adopted as it now stands. I made the point then that I could not be called upon (for I was one of the recusant Senators) while the roll was being called and until the vote was announced; and for the very purpose of getting rid of that argument when they came to revise the rules they put in this provision:

And these proceedings shall be had after the roll shall have been called and before the result of the vote is announced.

That was put in expressly for the purpose of doing away with that decision. That decision was perfectly right at the time that it was made under the rules as they stood.

Mr. President, I hope I will be allowed to say a word further. The Senator from Connecticut has taken the only course that is proper to be taken. He has moved that a Senator here shall be required—naming him—to assign his reason for not voting. That is a perfectly proper motion under Rule 17 before the vote is announced, but then it takes a majority of the Senate to make the requirement. No one Senator can make it. It requires a vote of the Senate to make it; and then what condition will we be in? He shall be required. Required by whom? Required by the Senate. The rule does not say he shall be required by the Chair; it does not say that any single Senator may require him.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Ohio will allow me to suggest that under the very literalism of that rule it is the duty of the Chair to direct the Clerk to call the name of a Senator who is present who has failed to vote.

Mr. THURMAN. I say again that when the rule says he shall be required, it must mean that he shall be required by the Senate. There is nothing to authorize the presiding officer of the Senate to require it. Therefore what is the result of all this proceeding? The question now before the Senate, the only question that is in order, is upon the motion made by the Senator from Connecticut that the Senator from New York be required to state his reasons for not voting. We will have the yeas and nays on that, our friends over here will not vote, we will have no majority of a quorum, and then we will be where we are now; the whole thing will come to nothing. I have seen it tried so often that I am sick of it, and I move that the Senate take a recess for six hours.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the motion of the Senator from Ohio to take a recess is not now in order; and the Chair, in its decision of the question of order, will direct a further reading of the compilation, and will then decide, and the Chair will not entertain further debate on the question.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NOTE.—The rulings of the Chair and the action of the Senate upon this question are confused and unsatisfactory. Taking the sixteenth rule as the ground of proceeding, the proper time to require a Senator to vote would seem to be when his name is called by the Secretary. It is then that he is to give "special reasons" for refusing to vote, of which the Senate alone is to judge—and this judgment is to be rendered without debate and by a vote of the Senate. If a Senator is present and refuses to vote when his name is called, and he is not then called upon, or required to give, or does not offer to give, "special reasons" why he should be "excused by the Senate," it might well be held that the Senate has waived its privilege as to him, and the calling of the next name on the roll, with a response thereto, forecloses the question, and he cannot afterward be challenged. The Senate has no right to compel or force a Senator to vote if, in the discharge of his duty, he should think fit to remain silent on a question. All it can do under its rule is to require of him "special reasons" for withholding his vote. These, when assigned, it may judge to be unsatisfactory; and if upon such judgment he should still refuse to vote, it is for the Senate to deal with him afterward, and upon a subsequent proceeding; and in the mean time the roll-call is to proceed to a conclusion, that the question in hand may be disposed of in order.

The Senate has no power over the voice of any of its members. It can only declare the reasons assigned for not voting insufficient or unsatisfactory. It may in such case, where a Senator still remains mute, reprimand or censure him; but this is the extent of its power. It cannot compel that voice which he may be resolved, for reasons however unsatisfactory to the Senate, still sufficient for him not to give. The record of the Senate is thus made up, and for the part he may have in it he is responsible to the State and the people whom he is supposed to represent. The Senate may exercise a larger discretion in dealing with a contumacious witness who refuses to testify, than with a Senator who refuses to vote. In the case of a witness, he refuses to disclose the truth which the Senate, for the purposes of justice, has a legal right to require of him; in the case of a Senator, he simply refuses to exercise a right which the Constitution gives him without qualification as to how he shall exercise, or whether he shall exercise it at all—leaving the matter entirely at his own discretion.

The practice of the Senate in permitting its members without question or challenge, to withhold their votes, whenever they have thought fit to do so, has been so uniform and unbroken that, so far as precedent can make it so, it has become an absolute parliamentary right, and cannot be questioned without reversing the steady practice upon which the members of the body have a right to rely as their protection in the exercise of their discretion in giving or withholding their votes.

In the case to which this note is appended the ground upon which certain Senators, being present, refused to vote, were, under the sixteenth rule, required to answer to their names, was that such refusal would leave the Senate without a quorum, and thus obstruct its business; but the absence of a quorum is provided for, however imperfectly, by the eighth rule, and under that rule all subsequent proceedings are to be had until a quorum shall appear in the Chamber.

From all this it would seem to be the most orderly way of proceeding to require a Senator, when his name is called, either to vote or give to the Senate "special reasons," as required by the sixteenth rule, for not voting. Should he decline to to do either, or should he give reasons which the Senate, by a vote, shall pronounce unsatisfactory, and he should still withhold his vote, the roll-call is to proceed to a conclusion, and the Senator is to be dealt with by the Senate by a separate proceeding afterward—and this that the question before the Senate may be disposed of in an orderly way, and not be complicated nor shoved out of the way by another and totally different one. Should a Senator refusing to vote not be challenged at the time his name is called, and the call be proceeded with, the right to challenge should be considered as waived and he exempt from further question; for what says the rule? "Each Senator called upon shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare, openly and without debate, his assent or dissent to the question." (See ruling of the Chair, (Mr. CARPENTER,) Senate Journal, third session Forty-first Congress, 355.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that Rule 16 referred to there is not precisely the same as Rule 17. It corresponds in part with Rule 16 as we now have it, and embraces also a part of Rule 17. The Chair decides that the Chair has no right on his own motion to require a Senator declining to vote to assign his reasons.

Mr. EATON. May I take——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that when a Senator alleged to be present has declined to vote, and before the announcement of the roll-call a Senator moves the Senate that that Senator, naming him, is present and has declined to vote, and that he be required to assign his reasons, that question must then be decided, and by the Senate, without debate.

Mr. EATON. Then, of course, there is no Senator so foolish as to put a question of that sort.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. EATON. No; I withdraw it.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, let us hear the vote if we may.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the Chair state what the question is before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on announcing the vote. The Senator from Connecticut moved that the Senator from New York be required to assign his reasons, and the Chair proposed to submit that to the Senate, that they might or might not require him to assign his reasons. The Chair declines to peremptorily order any Senator to assign his reasons.

Mr. EATON. I beg the Chair's pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thereupon the Senator from Connecticut withdrew his motion.

Mr. EATON. The Chair is mistaken. The Senator from Connecticut made no such motion as to move the Senate to order the Senator from New York to assign his reasons. He asked the Presiding Officer to order that the Senator from New York give his reasons. It would be very foolish in the Senator from Connecticut to ask a Senate that refuses to vote to order another Senator to vote.

Mr. CONKLING. The regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will announce the result of the vote on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 0; as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. CONKLING. Regular order.

Mr. THURMAN. What is the regular order?

Mr. INGALLS and others. The call of the roll.

Mr. McDONALD. We have reached a point in this case which has been reached several times since I have been a member of the Senate, and which very clearly discloses the fact that in the present condition of things the rules of the Senate are insufficient to enable it to conduct business.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator is out of order.

Mr. McDONALD. I am speaking by general consent; so far nobody has objected. A quorum of the Senate consists of a majority of Senators duly chosen. If they are present in the Senate Chamber they constitute a quorum of the Senate competent to transact business. The rule requires that that majority shall be present in the Senate Chamber, and when that majority is present there is a quorum for the transaction of business. I do not understand from the rules that this can only be disclosed by the votes cast by the Senators present upon a call of the yeas and nays. The failure of Senators in the Senate Chamber to vote cannot withdraw their presence from the Senate Chamber so as to destroy the quorum; but as the rules relating to voting do not possess the necessary authority to compel a Senator to answer when his name is called, and are framed upon the assumption that each Senator will thus answer unless he is able to render such an excuse to the Senate as will be satisfatory to it, it is very evident that upon his declining to vote there is no power under these rules to force him to vote in order to proceed any further.

In my State this same difficulty has been encountered, and the legislative rules of the Legislature of Indiana now provide for it. They provide for it by requiring the officer who calls the roll to note the Senators present, those voting and those not voting; and if counting those who have voted, either yea or nay, and those present not voting, there is a quorum, then the proposition is passed in the affirmative or negative, as the majority of the yeas or nays may be. Until the rules of the Senate of the United States, having been found insufficient in this particular, are thus changed, there is but one mode of being able to conduct business while a minority of the Senate are unwilling to respond to their names, and that is by the majority having the force and power in and of themselves to go on without regard to the minority. There must therefore, under these rules as they have been applied since I have been in the Senate, be a quorum of Senators present willing to vote and to record their votes in order that business may be transacted.

Mr. BAYARD. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. I have seen this rule enforced, and I have yielded a ready obedience to it when read to me for the purpose of producing a quorum in the Senate. It is the very object of it; and therefore to give such a construction to the rule as is contended for now simply makes it perform suicide. You reduce the rule to an absurdity by declaring that when it is required to produce the proof of the presence of a quorum it shall be inefficient for the very end for which it was designed; it is a reductio ad absurdum.

Mr. McDONALD. It has been reduced to an absurdity in the Senate again and again, and it is being reduced to an absurdity here to-night. Suppose the Senator from Delaware when called upon had refused to vote?

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Delaware obeys the rules.

Mr. CONKLING. Now if the Senator from Indiana yields to anybody else I shall object.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not break them; I never did.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order. It is enough, I humbly submit, that without a quorum and in violation of the rules one Senator proceeds in a line of remark which he does not intend as a lecture but which sounds a little like it. When he comes to yield to other Senators to contribute all around, with great kindness to him, I object, and I demand the regular order.

Mr. THURMAN. What is the regular order?

Mr. CONKLING. The regular order is to call the roll, or else to adjourn, or take a recess; and the rule declares expressly that no business or debate shall go on.

Mr. McDONALD. I say that there is a quorum present.

Mr. WITHERS. I want to ask the Senator from New York how he can invoke the protection of the rule when he violates it first?

Mr. CONKLING. I deny that I violate any rule. The record discloses that no quorum is here; the rule declares that no business shall be done; and I respectfully submit the point of order, and object to the doing of any business save that which the rule points out, namely, calling the roll, or taking a recess, or adjourning, those things being within the power of less than a quorum.

Mr. WITHERS. And Rule 17 requires every Senator to vote.

Mr. CONKLING. I call the Senator to order.

Mr. WITHERS. I call the Senator to order himself.

Mr. CONKLING. I have submitted a point of order as I have a right to do.

Mr. WITHERS. I submit that the Senator has no right to violate the rules of the Senate as he has done.

Mr. CONKLING. I have not violated any rule.

Mr. McDONALD. I deny that there is no quorum of Senators present in this Chamber. All that is required is that there shall be present a majority of Senators duly chosen and sworn; and I say that there is such a majority present, as every Senator here knows there is such a majority present, and if a portion of them are unwilling to answer to their names when called upon the roll, that does not absent them from the Chamber.

Mr. ANTHONY. I call the Senator to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has tried to rule Senators down time and again, he will state in answer to the Senator from Rhode Island, but Senators decline to be ruled down. The Chair feels a delicacy in compelling them. The whole proceeding is out of order.

Mr. ANTHONY. I rise to make a motion which is in order, and I rise in behalf of the tired and sleepless officers of this body. There is barely time now to put this Chamber in order for the inaugural ceremonies, and if we wait much longer the floors will not be swept, the chairs will not be arranged, and the proceedings cannot go on orderly and decorously. I move that the Senate take a recess until half past nine o'clock this morning.

Mr. CONKLING. Say ten o'clock.

Mr. RANSOM. That motion is not in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is in order.

Mr. RANSOM. I ask the Chair if it is in order.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say a word on that. It is in order if there is a quorum here. If there is not a quorum it is not in order. When there is not a quorum present the only motion that can be made is for a call of the Senate or an adjournment.

Mr. CONKLING. Or an adjournment to a time certain.

Mr. THURMAN. There is no motion for a recess provided by the rule; but I say with my friend from Indiana, there is a quorum here; and I say that when the Army bill was under consideration, and our friends over here were filibustering, being then in the chair, I counted the Senate and declared there was a quorum, and I was sustained by the Senate in holding that there was a quorum, although at the last taking of the yeas and nays a quorum had not voted. But the simplest way in the world about this matter, if anybody doubts whether that ruling was right, although the record will show it was acquiesced in, and that I was sustained in it again—if there is any doubt of that let the list of the Senators be called, and that will disclose a quorum, and then the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island will be in order, and I will cheerfully vote for it.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Chair can decide now as the Chair very properly did at the time the Senator from Ohio refers to, and ascertain from his own observation that there is a quorum present.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, he can do that, and therefore no call of the Senate is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has counted forty Senators in the Senate Chamber, and as the Chair is advised it has heretofore been the decision in such a case, the Chair will adhere to that decision, and decide that there is a quorum present.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I then renew the motion that the Senators who declined to answer to their names when called be now required to answer.

Mr. ANTHONY. I interpose a motion for a recess, which is in order.

Mr. CONKLING. Say until ten.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think we had better take a recess until half past nine. I will move that the Senate take a recess for five hours.

Mr. HARRIS. Does not the rule require that when less than a quorum is shown no motion is in order except a call of the Senate or a motion to adjourn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has decided, in pursuance of the decision which has been stated to have been made by the Chair heretofore, that he had a right to count the Senators and determine whether there was a quorum present. The Chair did that, and determined that there is a quorum present, which was in lieu of calling the roll, and ascertaining the fact in that way.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not deny that a quorum is present. I grant that a motion to take a recess is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has counted forty Senators.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate take a recess for five and a half hours.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] made a motion. The Senator from Delaware will please state his motion again.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Does not the motion to take a recess have precedence?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will permit the motion of the Senator from Delaware to be stated, and then the Chair will rule on it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Chair having announced that a quorum is present, I now renew the motion that Senators declining to answer when their names were called be called on to make an excuse for not answering.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware has made the motion which he has stated, pending which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] moves that the Senate take a recess for five and a half hours. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 22.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Anthony,	Ferry,	Logan,	Rollins,
Baldwin,	Hill of Colorado,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Blair,	Ingalls,	Morrill,	Teller,

Bruce,	Farley,	Jones of Florida,
Cameron of Wis.,	Grover,	McPherson,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. Is there any unfinished business? Is there a bill pending before the Senate?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir; plenty of business. I am trying to make a motion on that subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs, if no other motion has intervened, upon the motion of the Senator from North Carolina that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. There is no unfinished business. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. VOORHEES. I was going to observe, if the Chair could observe me, that I desire unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of House bills that have been favorably reported to this body by its committees. There are such bills upon the Calendar; and as we have wasted nearly all night we might as well spend the rest of the time in doing something that will ease a few aching hearts in or about this Capitol and throughout the country. I think that is the most practical way of spending the last hours of this night.

If I am in order, and I do not suppose I am, for I hardly ever am, for I profess to know but very few rules of this body, it is one of the subjects that I cannot comprehend by even close study, but if I am in order I desire now to state a few things which I would have stated awhile ago if the Senate had required my friends who did not vote on the question of going into executive session to give the reasons therefor.

I may be wrong, but I feel really indifferent upon the subject of the recent nominations of officers to this body by the President of the United States. I cannot say that I feel unkindly to him, or that I feel disappointed in anything he has done, because I had no right to expect much; but there are things which it is not proper for me to speak of in open session. There have been instances of unfairness and of partisanship in the recent flood of nominations which came here, which relieve me in my own conscience of any anxiety or desire to act upon what the President has done, and if the presence was a different one from what it is now, I would state more fully the reasons for my conduct. I have not voted for or against these motions for executive sessions simply because I feel as indifferent on the subject as the flabby nature of the circumstances require.

I look upon the nominations as just well enough to be made over again. I do not know that we on this side of the Chamber will fare any better with the incoming Administration than we have with the outgoing one; but I am willing to take my chances for a fair look at a man's merits in those nominations which have been sent to the Senate. I do not think any Senator will say that I shrank from my duties to my party on this side of the Chamber, nor do I think any one will say that I shrink from my sense of duty if I differ from my party in this Chamber.

I wished to say this much in explanation to my colleagues and associates on this side of the Chamber as well as on the other side. I have not voted on the question of going into executive session. I would have voted against going in except for the fact that personal friends whom I esteem and cherish wanted an executive session. I did not want it, and did not care for it. I care nothing on the subject of the nominations which are before this body now; they give me no concern whatever; and that is the explanation I would have given if I could have done so at the proper time. I have been so indifferent as not to record my vote on that subject, although sitting in my seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that the question before the Senate now is the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to proceed to the consideration of executive business, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. TELLER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. Now I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. That leaves legislative business in order, I believe.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Would it be proper to go on with legislative business?

Mr. CONKLING. If this is laid on the table it will be in order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I think we had better go to the Calendar.

Mr. RANSOM. Is it in order to lay a motion for an executive session or to adjourn, on the table?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks not, and the Chair will so decide. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAMPTON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 33, nays none; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Bailey,	Ferry,	McPherson,	Vest,

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask now that the names of Senators who are present in the Chamber and have not answered to their names be called to make their excuses for not answering.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that the motion is too late after the announcement.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There has been no announcement except of how many voted, but no announcement of the result.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to my friend from Delaware that his suggestion comes too late; it should have been after the reading by the Clerk of the names of those who had voted before the announcement. Now that the vote has been passed it is not in order to demand that which the Senator now demands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is just what the Chair decides.

Mr. HARRIS. But, Mr. President, I desire to move a call of the Senate. I am quite aware of the rule which makes it the duty of the Chair to require the roll to be called when a vote has developed less than a quorum, and I ask a call of the Senate with a view of moving that absent Senators be required to attend.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator indulge me in one word? I have never known a system of coercion to obtain votes in the other House or here. You may say we ought to do it; but we cannot do it. I was once a member of a very slight minority in the House during the war; my most distinguished and excellent friend on my right, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] was there also, when we resorted to what we thought our rights—fell back upon them—and, though few in number, we were never coerced to depart from our line of conduct, and it was just as impossible to do so as it is to make a horse drink that you have taken to the trough; if he does not want to do it, you cannot make him do it. We are spending our time here on a proposition which it is manifest we shall not succeed in, and I do hope the Senate, if we are to stay in session here, will take up some bill that will do some good and help somebody. For the sake of the Senator from North Carolina, for the sake of other Senators, I, personally, would be glad to see them have their wishes accomplished.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to suggest to him that the motion of the Senator from North Carolina is pending, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, the Senator from North Carolina cannot withdraw the motion if he would.

Mr. THURMAN. He can withdraw it by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. It can only be done by unanimous consent. If the Senator from Indiana will ask unanimous consent I will not be an objector.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 6033, for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from North Carolina withdraw the motion to go into executive session.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope that will be done.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope unanimous consent will be given, so that we may get out of this tangle.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is impracticable. My experience in both branches of Congress proves to me that it cannot be done. Whether the minority is right or wrong in breaking a quorum, it is one of the reserved rights of a minority.

Mr. RANSOM. Will my friend pardon me? If it is the unanimous wish of the Senate, I shall withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to withdraw his motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business. Will the Senate consent? The Chair hears no objection, and the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. BECK. I move that the Senate now take a recess until half past nine o'clock.

Mr. THURMAN. Say for how many hours.

Mr. CONKLING. Half past nine is just as well.

Mr. THURMAN. Say five and a half hours.

Mr. BECK. I make the motion, and I desire to say that it is too late to legislate.

Mr. VOORHEES. Out of compliment to the great ability of the Senator from Tennessee I desire that he may have an opportunity to take up and pass a bill of local interest to him and his State.

Mr. THURMAN. Let us take it up.

Mr. VOORHEES. I refer to the bill for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others, which has been twice before the Senate, and to which there is no valid objection.

Mr. HARRIS. I am very grateful to the Senator from Indiana, and I will move that the Senate do now proceed to consider House bill No. 6033.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has pending a motion to take a recess until a certain time. The motion of the Senator from Tennessee is not in order while the motion to take a recess is pending.

Mr. BECK. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion for a recess is withdrawn, and the Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill which will be reported by its title.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. No. 6033) to pay Hiram Johnson and other persons herein named the several sums of money herein specified, being the surplus of a military assessment paid by them and accounted for to the United States in excess of the amount required for the idemnity for which it was levied and collected.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senate that the motion now before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to proceed to the consideration of the bill which has been reported, and the rule of the Senate is that on a motion to take up a bill or resolution for consideration debate shall be limited to fifteen minutes, and no Senator shall speak to such motion oftener than once or for a longer time than five minutes.

Mr. INGALLS. Does not that apply during the morning hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It applies during the whole session:

Resolved, That, for the remainder of the present session, on a motion to take up a bill or resolution for consideration at the present or at a future time debate shall be limited to fifteen minutes, and no Senator shall speak to such motion oftener than once, or for a longer time than five minutes.

That rule is now in force. The Senator from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. TELLER. It is very apparent that this little bill will meet with opposition. When it was before the Senate some time since several Senators expressed their intention to antagonize the bill. It is not worth while for us to spend two or three hours more over a controversy of this kind, and therefore I move that we take a recess until half past nine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, the Senator from Colorado moves that the Senate take a recess until half-past nine o'clock.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire what was before the Senate when the motion to proceed to executive business was originally made?

Mr. HARRIS. I think it was the motion I now make.

Mr. CONKLING. I inquire of the Chair and ask that the record be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has asked a question of the Chair. The Chair is trying to obtain the information to answer. The present occupant was not in the chair at the time and therefore cannot tell personally.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Is it proper to make a motion to adjourn? If it is, I make that motion right now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. We cannot adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to adjourn, and it is not debatable.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that prior to the making of the motion by the Senator from North Carolina to proceed to the consideration of executive business the Senator from Tennessee had moved to lay aside the prior and all pending orders, which motion had prevailed, and he had then moved to proceed to the consideration of this bill for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered, when the Senator from Connecticut rose.

Mr. CONKLING. That is just what I supposed was true; therefore the motion was before the Senate and the Chair had announced that the time for debate was exhausted. So that the new motion is not in order and there is no new time for debate on taking it up.

Mr. THURMAN. No necessity for it.

Mr. CONKLING. No necessity for it at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 33, nays 1; as follows:

YEAS—33.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a quorum voting.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 164) relating to salaries of government employés in the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 182) granting a pension to Mary A. Shemelia;

A bill (S. No. 465) granting an increase of pension to George Smith; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2165) to amend section 2297 of title 32 of the Revised Statutes, relating to homestead settlers.

HIRAM JOHNSON AND OTHERS.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise simply to say that, seeing as I do a fixed resolve not to take up and give me the judgment of the Senate upon the bill that I have desired to invoke the judgment of the Senate upon, if there is any other bill pending that is unobjected to and that will not encounter the opposition which the bill that I have desired to have considered will, I shall withdraw my motion and not remain an obstruction to legislation.

Mr. BECK and others addressed the Chair.

Mr. BAILEY. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL.) There are eight or ten Senators on the floor. The Chair cannot and will not recognize them all at once.

Mr. BAILEY. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee will state his point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. The point of order is this: A message has been received from the House of Representatives when it appears from a roll-call that a quorum of the Senate is not in session. I submit that the message from the House of Representatives cannot be received.

Several SENATORS. Too late.

Mr. THURMAN. The Chair can count the Senate and see whether there is a quorum.

Mr. HEREFORD. The Chair announced "no quorum pre

Mr. THURMAN. No, "no quorum voting."

Mr. BAILEY. A quorum is always present when voting. It is not present when not voting. The President of the Senate immediately before the reception of the message from the House announced that no quorum was present.

Mr. THURMAN. That no quorum voted.

Mr. BAILEY. The next step afterward taken was a message from the House of Representatives. I submit that the message from the House cannot be received when there is not a quorum present.

Mr. TELLER. It has been received.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had announced no quorum voting. The Chair then stated that it would receive a message from the House of Representatives. No objection was made to it. The message has been received; has been communicated. If the Senator desires to have action on it there will have to be a different motion from the one that is made. The Chair decides that that motion would not now be in order.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take up joint resolution authorizing the President to place Thomas L. Crittenden on the retired list of the Army as brigadier-general, being Senate resolution No. 141, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate to say a single word. The resolution was reported by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] unanimously from the Committee on Military Affairs. General Crittenden is nearly sixty-two years of age, and his leave of absence has about expired. He is ordered to Dakota. He is not able to go without danger to his health, and perhaps to his life. He has served the country long and well. He was an aid of General Taylor in Mexico. He lost his only child in the battle-field with Custer, and his wife's health is such that he cannot leave her. I hope the Senate will allow the resolution to be considered. The House will pass it beyond all doubt if I can get it there in an hour. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion until the Chair ascertains whether there is a quorum. There not being a quorum on the last vote, the Chair will count the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand the Chair decided that there was a quorum present, so as to receive a message from the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not decide that question. No objection was made to receiving the message on that ground. The message was received. If the Senator desires to raise a point upon it, it must be by motion.

Mr. BAILEY. I submit the question whether the Chair can receive a message from the House when the Chair has just decided that no quorum is present, and when the Chair has undertaken to declare no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If objection had been submitted in time the Chair would have entertained it, but the message has been communicated to the Senate. It will be kept so, unless some motion is made to take it out of the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. I understood the Chair to announce a moment ago that a quorum was present. He had already decided that a quorum was not present, and he is now undertaking to decide that a quorum is present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has never decided that there was no quorum present, but decided that there was no quorum voting, and has so stated the question twice. On the roll-call there was no quorum. The message of the House was received without the attention of the Chair being called to it; but now, legislative business being called for, before the Chair entertains that, the Chair will count the number of Senators present, and will entertain no motion until that count is made.

Mr. BAILEY. I have a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (counting the Senate.) The Chair finds forty Senators present in the Senate Chamber. The Senator from Tennessee will state his question of order.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no question of order now.

THOMAS L. CRITTENDEN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution named by him; which will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (S. R. No. 141) authorizing the President to place Thomas L. Crittenden upon the retired list with the rank and pay of a brigadier-general.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of this joint resolution?

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution; which was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, in line 10, after the word "authorized," to strike out "place upon the retired list of the Army the name of" and insert "nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint;" and in line 8, after the word "war," to insert "a brigadier-general in the United States Army, and to place his name upon the retired list of the Army;" so as to make the resolution read:

That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Thomas L. Crittenden, now colonel of the Seventeenth Regiment, United States Army, formerly major-general of volunteers in the late war, a brigadier general in the United States Army, and to place his name upon the retired list of the Army with the rank and pay of brigadier-general on the retired list.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELECTIONS OF SENATORS.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move to take up for present consideration Senate bill No. 404.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Is there objection?

Mr. CALL. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

Mr. GROOME. I move to postpone the present and all prior orders——

Mr. INGALLS. It appears to me the bill could not go over on one objection.

Mr. ROLLINS. I made the motion.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from New Hampshire moved to take up that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asked for unanimous consent, so understanding the Senator from New Hampshire; but if he made the motion, the Chair will submit the motion to the Senate.

Mr. ROLLINS. I made the motion to postpone prior orders in order to take up the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not so understand the Senator from New Hampshire, but that being the motion, the Chair will now put it to the Senate. Will the Senate postpone the pending and all prior orders in order that the Senator from New Hampshire may move to proceed to the consideration of the bill referred to by him?

Several SENATORS. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. No. 404) to amend section 14, chapter 1 of title 2 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. THURMAN. What is the use of passing a Senate bill now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate further postpone the prior and pending orders so as to proceed to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BUTLER. Pending that I move that the Senate take a recess for four hours and a half.

The question being put on Mr. BUTLER's motion, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. BUTLER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Baldwin,	Coke,	Kernan,	Pendleton,
Bayard,	Farley,	Logan,	Vest,
Butler,	Hill of Colorado,	McMillan,	Wallace,
Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Maxey,	Windom,
Cockrell,	Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,	Withers.

NAYS—25.

Bailey,	Garland,	Ransom,	Vance,
Beck,	Groome,	Rollins,	Voorhees,
Blair,	Hampton,	Saulsbury,	Walker,
Bruce,	Harris,	Saunders,	Williams.
Call,	Hereford,	Slater,
Conkling,	Lamar,	Teller,
Eaton,	Paddock,	Thurman,

ABSENT—30.

Allison,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Platt,
Anthony,	Dawes,	Jonas,	Plumb,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Pugh,
Booth,	Ferry,	Kellogg,	Randolph
Brown,	Grover,	Kirkwood,	Sharon,
Burnside,	Hamlin,	McDonald,	Whyte.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Georgia,	McPherson,
Davis of Illinois,	Hoar,	Morgan,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to postpone the present and prior orders.

Mr. CALL. I hope that the Senate will proceed with the consideration of House bills on the Calendar, and let us try and dispose of the few which yet remain.

Mr. ROLLINS. I will agree to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire withdraw his motion?

Mr. ROLLINS. No, I do not. This bill will occupy but a few moments, not more than ten minutes at most, and then we can take up House bills. If it occupies over ten minutes I will withdraw it.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. ROLLINS. We can dispose of this bill while the yeas and nays are being called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina demands the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EATON. Is it proper to inquire what the bill is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be reported by its title for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. No. 404) to amend section 14, chapter 1 of title 2 of the Revised Statutes."

Mr. WHYTE. What is that?

Mr. BAILEY. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. EATON. Let that come up; it ought to be passed.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there a report accompanying that bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no report.

Mr. ROLLINS. I will simply say that it is the unanimous report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no printed or written report.

Mr. ROLLINS. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, reported by the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the reading of the section of the Revised Statutes which this proposes to amend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will read the section of the Revised Statutes called for.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. The Legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. MORRILL. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Anthony,	Cameron of Pa.,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,
Baldwin,	Conkling,	McMillan,	Williams,
Beck,	Eaton,	Plumb,	Windom.
Blair,	Groome,	Ransom,
Bruce,	Hill of Colorado,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Ingalls,	Saunders,

NAYS—19.

Bailey,	Farley,	Kernan,	Vest,
Bayard,	Garland,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Butler,	Harris,	Slater,	Wallace,
Call,	Hereford,	Thurman,	Whyte.
Coke,	Jonas,	Vance,

ABSENT—35.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Paddock,
Blaine,	Ferry,	Kirkwood,	Platt,
Booth,	Grover,	Lamar,	Pugh,
Brown,	Hamlin,	Logan,	Randolph,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hampton,	McDonald,	Saulsbury,
Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	McPherson,	Sharon,
Davis of Illinois,	Hoar,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Morgan,	Withers.
Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Morrill,

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire now moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 404.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to say, Mr. President, that it is necessary that a recess should now be taken in order to the orderly and decent proceedings of to-morrow in the ceremonies of inauguration; and therefore I move that the Senate take a recess for four and a half hours. I do hope that gentlemen on this side of the Chamber will vote for that motion.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let me say one word.

Mr. ROLLINS. I appeal to the Senator from Ohio to allow me just a word.

Mr. PENDLETON. I decline to yield to any Senator to make an explanation in reference to pending business.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then I hope the motion will be voted down.

Mr. PENDLETON. I know it is necessary now to take this recess, if we intend to properly inaugurate the President of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Ohio is not debatable.

Mr. BAYARD. As an associate on the committee of arrangements with the Senator from Ohio I rise to say that I hope his motion will prevail.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope it will not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion submitted by the Senator from Ohio is not debatable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not propose to debate it, but I propose to state the importance of that very question. I recollect the trouble we had here when the last Senator from New Hampshire came here and his case occupied this Senate nearly two weeks in discussing his title to a seat on this floor. This bill is intended merely to meet that difficulty and provide for it. I am in favor of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to take a recess for four hours and a half.

Mr. BAILEY. I trust the Senate will take up and consider and pass that bill. I voted against taking it up, but I think——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there is unanimous consent the Chair cannot permit debate to proceed.

Mr. BAILEY. Just one word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no authority to hear one word without unanimous consent. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. FARLEY. The motion is to take a recess until half past nine o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the Senate take a recess for four and a half hours.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 33, noes 12.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (at five o'clock a. m.) The motion prevails.

Mr. ROLLINS. Yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken.

Mr. BAILEY. I trust I may be allowed to say one word.

Several SENATORS. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the Chair decides that the Senator from Tennessee is not in order. The roll will be called.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Anthony,	Cockrell,	Maxey,	Thurman,
Baldwin,	Farley,	Morrill,	Vance,
Bayard,	Garland,	Pendleton,	Vest,
Bruce,	Hill of Colorado,	Plumb,	Walker,
Burnside,	Ingalls,	Ransom,	Withers.
Butler,	Kernan,	Saulsbury,
Cameron of Pa.,	McPherson,	Slater,

NAYS—13.

Blair,	Groome,	Rollins,	Williams.
Call,	Harris,	Saunders,
Conkling,	McMillan,	Teller,
Eaton,	Paddock,	Voorhees,

ABSENT—36.

Allison,	Davis of W. Va.,	Hoar,	McDonald,
Bailey,	Dawes,	Johnston,	Morgan,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Jonas,	Platt,
Blaine,	Ferry,	Jones of Florida,	Pugh,

Coke,	Hereford,	Lamar,	Whyte,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Georgia,	Logan,	Windom.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (at five o'clock a. m.) The Senate takes a recess until nine and a half o'clock this morning.

MORNING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past nine o'clock a. m., (Friday March 4.)

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is evidently no quorum present.

COMMITTEE ON LIBRARY ACCOMMODATION.

Mr. VOORHEES, (at ten o'clock and twenty minutes a. m.) I ask that a concurrent resolution which was adopted by the Senate continuing the Joint Select Committee on the subject of additional accommodations for the Library be returned by the House to the Senate. I wish the Senate to make a request of the House to return that concurrent resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A message to that effect will be sent to the House, if no objection be made.

PAY OF SENATE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. BUTLER. I offer the following resolution——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not feel warranted in entertaining anything of a legislative nature in the way of business. There is evidently not a quorum here.

Mr. BUTLER. My impression is that there is a quorum in the Chamber. It can very easily be tested. There are many Senators in the cloak-room.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If they will make their appearance inside the Chair will be very glad to recognize a quorum.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that my resolution be read.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose there is no objection to having the resolution read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK read as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That to enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay the officers and employés of the Senate borne on the annual rolls on the 4th day of March, 1881, one month's extra pay at the rate of compensation now paid them by law, a sum sufficient to pay the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The VICE-PRESIDEENT. What is the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to hear it reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be again read.

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senate know what my position was on this, and I hardly think it would be expedient with the present number in the Senate here to pass such a resolution. I should be glad to have had our employés put on a footing with those of the House, but I hardly think it a proper thing to do with so thin a Senate. If the Senate was full, I should not have a word to say about it.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand the Senator from West Virginia as objecting to the resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so interprets the remarks of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BUTLER. He says he knows of other Senators who are opposed to it. I think they can speak for themselves if they come here. If the Senator objects, of course that settles it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have a right to object on account of a quorum not being present.

Mr. RANSOM. I think there is a quorum.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the roll will be called.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The roll of the Senate will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and thirty-eight Senators answered to their names.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

Mr. BUTLER. I now ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I had the honor to introduce.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution introduced by him, which will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (S. R. No. 167) to pay officers and employés of the Senate borne on the annual roll one month's extra pay.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution has already been read twice.

The joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. This is unprecedented. I believe we have never done it. I gave the Senate last night a fair opportunity of providing for the employés of the Senate. I thought they ought to have done so; but I hardly think this ought to be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution having had three several readings, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I intended to object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator did not formally object. The Chair put the motion to the Senate for consideration and a majority voted for consideration. The question has progressed to this stage, Shall the resolution pass?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It certainly cannot be read three times on the same day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It could not if objection had been made. No objection was interposed. It has been read three times and the question now is, Shall the resolution pass? A bill can be read three times and passed on the same day if there be no objection. It has progressed to this stage without objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is an unpleasant duty; but I shall move to reconsider the vote. Certainly the Senate did not understand, I know I did not, that the resolution had had three readings at the same time, and I shall move to reconsider.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the vote by which this joint resolution was ordered to a third reading be reconsidered. The question is on that motion.

Mr. INGALLS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. We do not hear over here at all what the question is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is shall the vote be reconsidered by which the pending joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, it being a joint resolution providing a month's extra pay to the Senate officers.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Baldwin,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Teller,
Blair,	Hamlin,	McMillan,	Thurman,
Cockrell,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,	Vance.
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Georgia,	Rollins,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hoar,	Saunders,

NAYS—26.

Bailey,	Conkling,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Booth,	Garland,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Burnside,	Harris,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Hereford,	Morrill,	Walker,
Call,	Johnston,	Plumb,	Withers.
Cameron of Pa.,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Coke,	Kirkwood,	Randolph,

ABSENT—31.

Allison.	Eaton,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Anthony,	Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Slater,
Bayard,	Farley,	Kernan,	Vest,
Beck,	Ferry,	Logan,	Wallace,
Blaine,	Groome,	McDonald,	Whyte,
Brown,	Grover,	Maxey,	Williams,
Bruce,	Hampton,	Paddock,	Windom.
Cameron of Wis.,	Jones of Florida,	Pendleton,

So the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall this joint resolution pass?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, believing that the vote as announced is the expression of the Senate, which is the only thing I desired, I shall make no further objection to the resolution in any way. I am glad the Senate has voted upon it. I wanted them to give an expression to their view. That was the way I thought it best to do it.

The joint resolution was passed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. TELLER, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Frank D. Yates and others be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Mark Walker be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Mrs. S. A. Wright, widow of George Wright, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, it was Ordered. That William Tully have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and papers connected with the bill regulating the compensation of paymasters' clerks in the United States Army.

UTAH AND NORTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. PADDOCK. I want to ask the Senate to allow my colleague to call up the House bill which he sought to bring to the attention of the Senate last night and to which I think there will be no objection. There are amendments proposed by the Senate committee which it is agreed shall be left off and the bill presented to the Senate exactly as it came from the House——

Mr. BURNSIDE. There will be great objection to the bill, and it cannot be passed in the limited time left.

Mr. PADDOCK. If that is so, I have only to say that I have performed my duty in regard to it.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of 10,000 extra copies of the annual report of the Chief Signal Officer for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, for distribution by the War Department.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 419) to print 15,000 copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the statistics of the annual production of gold and silver in the United States; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4050) to divide the State of Louisiana into two judicial districts.

The message also returned the resolution of the Senate providing that the Joint Select Committee on additional accommodations for the Library of Congress may be continued during the recess, in compliance with the request of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 972) granting a pension to Mrs. Anna I. Guest;

A bill (S. No. 1114) granting a pension to Luman Case;

A bill (H. R. No. 4206) confirming and vesting the title to a certain tract of land in Burlington, Iowa, "in the independent school district" of said city;

A bill (H. R. No. 4050) to divide the State of Louisiana into two judicial districts;

A bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury, in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 164) relating to salaries of Government employés in the District of Columbia.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 419) to print 15,000 copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the statistics of the annual production of gold and silver in the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

ANNUAL REPORT OF CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives for the printing of 10,000 extra copies of the annual report of the Chief Signal Officer for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, for distribution by the War Department; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

ANNUAL PRODUCTION OF GOLD AND SILVER IN THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. RANSOM, (at ten o'clock and fifty minutes a. m.) I ask leave to report House joint resolution No. 419 from the Committee on Printing, and ask immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 419) to print 15,000 copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the statistics of the annual production of gold and silver in the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER.

Mr. RANSOM, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following House concurrent resolution, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed for distribution by the War Department 10,000 extra copies of the annual report of the Chief Signal Officer for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880.

COMMITTEE ON LIBRARY ACCOMMODATIONS.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I desire to call up the concurrent resolution which passed the Senate yesterday, and which I asked to have recalled from the House, and which has been returned. I move that it be amended so that it will not be a concurrent resolution, but a resolution for the Senate only, and in that shape I desire it passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana calls for the consideration of the concurrent resolution returned from the House of Representatives. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The vote by which the resolution was formerly passed will be regarded as reconsidered.

Mr. VOORHEES. Now I move to substitute the following;

Resolved, That the Select Committee on additional accommodations for the Library of Congress is hereby continued and authorized to sit during the coming recess of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

HEIRS OF LANGLEY B. CULLEY.

Mr. VANCE. Day before yesterday a bill was passed for the relief of the heirs of Langley B. Culley, and a motion to reconsider was entered. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina moves to lay the motion to reconsider a bill on the table, which will be reported by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (H. R. No. 3826) for the relief of the heirs of Langley B. Culley."

Mr. LOGAN. What is the object of calling up that bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is not aware.

Mr. VANCE. The object is to lay the motion to reconsider on the table and have the bill passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is not a debatable motion.

Mr. LOGAN. I know. I merely wish to give notice that the bill cannot pass, so far as I am concerned.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the motion to reconsider lie on the table?

A division was called for.

Mr. HOAR. What is the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be again reported by title.

The Chief Clerk again read the title of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I shall ask for the reading of the report so that the Senate may understand what the bill is.

Mr. VANCE. Is that in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not. It is in the nature of debate. Shall the motion to reconsider lie on the table?

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE. I desire now to give notice to the Senator from Illinois that the bill has passed.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of two members of the Senate be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that Congress having finished its business is now ready to close its session by adjournment.

The Vice-President was authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate, and Mr. SAULSBURY and Mr. HOAR were appointed.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. FERRY. I present the credentials of my colleague-elect, [Mr. CONGER,] and ask that they be placed upon the files of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the originals of these credentials have been hitherto presented, and are already on the files of the Senate.

Mr. FERRY. Then I ask that this duplicate be placed on the files of the Senate, the original having been laid already before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a resolution for the appointment of a committee of three members on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that Congress having finished its business, is now ready to close the session by adjournment, and had appointed Mr. J. RANDOLPH TUCKER of Virginia, Mr. GEORGE W. GEDDES of Ohio, and Mr. GEORGE M. ROBESON of New Jersey, the committee on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 3826) for the relief of the heirs of Langley B. Culley; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 419) to print 15,000 copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the statistics of the annual production of gold and silver in the United States.

EXTRA SESSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith a copy of a proclamation for the convening of an extraordinary session of the Senate of the United States at the Capitol, in the city of Washington, on the 4th day of March next, at noon.

R. B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 28, 1881.

BENJAMIN HARRISON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have the honor to inform the Senate that Hon. Benjamin Harrison, Senator-elect from the State of Indiana, has resigned his office as a member of the commission for the improvement of the Mississippi River; and that the same has been accepted, to take effect March 3, 1881.

R. B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 3, 1881.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The committee of the two Houses appointed to wait on the President and inform him that the two Houses had closed their business for the present session have performed that duty, and were informed by the President that he had no further communication to make to the present Congress.

SWEARING IN OF VICE-PRESIDENT.

The Vice-President-elect (Hon. CHESTER A. ARTHUR, of New York) entered the Chamber, accompanied by Mr. PENDLETON, Mr. BAYARD, and Mr. ANTHONY, as members of the committee of arrangements for the inauguration, and was conducted to a seat at the right of the retiring Vice-President, Hon. WILLIAM A. WHEELER.

Vice-President WHEELER. The Chair has the honor to present to the Senate of the United States Hon. CHESTER A. ARTHUR, Vice-President elect of the United States. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF THE VICE-PRESIDENT ELECT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT elect, (Mr. ARTHUR.) Senators, I come as your Presiding Officer with genuine solicitude. Remembering my inexperience in parliamentary proceedings, I cannot forget how important, delicate, and often embarrassing are the duties of the Chair.

At the threshold of our official association I invoke that courtesy and kindness with which you have been wont to aid your presiding officer. I shall need your constant encouragement and support, and I rely with confidence upon your lenient judgment of any errors into which I may fall.

In return, be assured of my earnest purpose to administer your rules in a spirit of absolute fairness, to treat every Senator at all times with that courtesy and just consideration due to the representatives of equal States, and to do my part—as assuredly each of you will do his—to maintain the order, decorum, and dignity of the Senate.

I trust that the official and personal relations upon which we now enter will be marked by mutual confidence and regard, and that all our obligations will be so fulfilled as to redound to our own honor, to the glory of our common country, and the prosperity of all its people. [Applause.]

I am now ready to take the oath of office prescribed by the Constitution.

Vice-President WHEELER administered the oath of office to Mr. ARTHUR, and then said:

Senators, the moment which terminates my official duties as Presiding Officer of the Senate is at hand. Those duties have been rendered of easy performance by your uniform leniency and forbearance. I am sure that in this parting hour I need no other guarantee of full amnesty for all my shortcomings. If I do, it is furnished in your very kind resolutions of approval of my official action. I shall carry into my retirement grateful memories of the personal kindness alike of the Senate and its officers, and a cordial wish for the future well-being of all.

And now I perform my last official act by declaring that the hour for the termination of the Forty-sixth Congress having arrived, the Senate stands adjourned without day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 3, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. David Wills, chaplain United States Army.

The Journal of Tuesday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. TYLER. Mr. Speaker, I was paired during Tuesday night's session with Mr. MULLER, of New York, but understanding that the pair terminated with the night session, I voted on all questions yesterday, and did not observe that the gentleman from New York did not vote. He now informs me that he was under the misapprehension that the pair was operative yesterday. I say this in justice to Mr. MULLER, who desired to vote in favor of the funding bill, but refrained from voting for the reason I have stated.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, with amendments in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced the adoption of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

It further announced the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 688) for the relief of the sureties of Franklin Travis, with an amendment in which concurrence was requested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask by unanimous consent to take up from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the sundry civil bill for the purpose of moving that they be non-concurred in and a conference requested.

Mr. VALENTINE. I ask, Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent to present a resolution.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I demand the regular order of business. The gentleman from Nebraska has already been allowed, by unanimous consent, to call up a bill which has been passed, while there are several other gentlemen who have been clamoring for recognition and have been refused it. I believe in fair dealing all round. I have no sort of objection to the gentleman's measure.

The SPEAKER. Does anybody object?

Mr. MCKENZIE. I have been asking for a year for recognition, and never have got it. I demand the regular order of business.

A MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President, by Mr. ROGERS, his Private Secretary.

CORRECTION OF JOURNAL.

Mr. UPSON. I am recorded as not having voted on the last vote on the funding bill. I did vote "no" on the McKinley amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded, and the correction will be made.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the sundry civil appropriation bill for the purpose of moving non-concurrence.

HOMESTEAD SETTLERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as managers of the conference on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2165) to amend section 2297 of title 32 of the Revised Statutes, relating to homestead settlers, Mr. CONVERSE, Mr. POEHLER, and Mr. WASHBURN.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, for the purpose of moving non-concurrence and asking a committee of conference.

Mr. WARNER. I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state what points of order he reserves?

Mr. WARNER. I do not know there are any; but I only reserve all points of order so as to be in time. I do not know there are any definitely.

The SPEAKER. The point of order might be made that would take the bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and if that point is to be made now is the time to make it. That point could not be made after the bill got into conference.

Mr. WARNER. I have not the amendments of the Senate before me. I do not want to embarrass the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. It is not an unreasonable request to have the amendments of the Senate read before they are acted on.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. WARNER. Yes; under the circumstances I will withdraw my point of order.

Mr. LAPHAM. I object until the amendments have been read for the information of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. The amendments of the Senate can be found in the RECORD, on page 2340. I supposed members had read them.

Mr. KEIFER. Why not concur in some of them?

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. LAPHAM. I do not insist on the further reading of the amendments.

Mr. SCALES. I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether there is any amendment from the Senate in reference to the Indian peace commission?

Mr. BLOUNT. There is not. The amendments are on page 2340 of the RECORD, except three amendments put on striking out the publication of some books and another relating to the employés of the Senate.

Mr. SCALES. That is all I desire to know, that there is no amendment on the bill in reference to the Indian commission.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now move that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in and a committee of conference requested.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. BRAGG. I am directed by the Committee on War Claims to move that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5521) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and acts amendatory thereof, and that the same be passed, together with the amendments reported from the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I call for the regular order, which is the unfinished business, being the apportionment bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York having charge of the unfinished business has not, as the Chair understands, been pressing the consideration of that business.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. But I have the right to raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize that; but does the gentleman desire to interrupt the consideration of this bill?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I have been upon the list to move a suspension of the rules on an important public bill since the 30th of last April.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no list, and has not recognized any since the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will withdraw his objection and allow this bill, which is an important public one, to be considered.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Kentucky to insist upon his question of consideration?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I withdraw the objection in consequence of the statement made that this is a public bill; but I shall insist on my right hereafter.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill and amendments of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the several persons in this act named the several sums mentioned herein, the same being in full for, and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted in each case as a full and final discharge of, the several claims presented by such persons to the commissioners of claims under the act of March 3, 1871, and reported to the House of Representatives under the said act, namely:

To Fannie S. and Mary A. Scott, $3,790.

The SPEAKER. Is there a second demanded on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with amendments?

Mr. HOOKER. I ask the chairman of the Committee on War Claims to permit me to move an amendment to the bill which I understand has been favorably acted upon by the committee and incorporated in a bill now pending before the House, No. 7199, for the relief of Julia A. Nutt. This bill simply proposes to refer the question of that claim to the Quartermaster-General to determine the amount due.

Mr. BRAGG. I have no objection to the incorporation of the amendment. The committee were unable to act upon it and they therefore reported a bill referring the question to the Quartermaster-General for information. That bill is now upon the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as an additional section the following:

"The Quartermaster-General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to examine, adjust, and settle the claims of Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, late of Natchez, in the State of Mississippi, growing out of the occupation and use by the United States Army, during the late rebellion, of the property of the said Haller Nutt during his life-time, or of his estate after his decease, including live stock, goods, and moneys taken and used by the United States or the armies thereof. And full jurisdiction is hereby given to the Quartermaster-General to try and determine the same; and he may consider the evidence heretofore taken on said claim, so far as applicable, before the commissioners of claims, and such other legal evidence as may be adduced before him in behalf of the legal representatives of Haller Nutt, deceased, or in behalf of the United States: Provided, That no part of said claims upon which said commissioners of claims have passed on the merits shall be considered by the Quartermaster-General."

Mr. CALKINS. Is that offered as an amendment to the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is an amendment proposed, as the Chair understands, with the consent of the chairman of the committee before the motion to suspend the rules is submitted.

Mr. HOOKER. It is proposed as an additional section to the bill.

Mr. CALKINS. How much money is involved it it?

Mr. HOOKER. I do not know the exact amount.

Mr. CALKINS. About how much?

Mr. HOOKER. I am unable to state. The gentleman from Wisconsin, the chairman of the committee which investigated the subject, will probably be better able to give you that information.

Mr. BRAGG. There is no specified amount involved in this bill. It simply refers the matter to the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. CALKINS. Can you state about how much it will involve?

Mr. HOOKER. I will repeat that it simply refers the whole question to the Quartermaster-General to investigate and see how much is due.

Mr. BRAGG. The bill was reported by the gentleman from Vermont who sits near the gentleman from Indiana, and he can possibly give the information.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not object; I simply ask for information as to what amount is involved in this proposed amendment.

Mr. BREWER. Does the Committee on War Claims favor this amendment?

Mr. BRAGG. The Committe on War Claims directed the bill to be reported favorably to the House, which bill is now proposed as an amendment or an additional section to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The proposed amendment is admitted, there being no objection. Is there a demand for a second on the motion to suspend the rules?

There was no demand for a second.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendments, when (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill passed.

CONFERENCE ON THE SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER appointed the following as conferees on the part of the House on the sundry civil appropriation bill: Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. MCMAHON, and Mr. MONROE.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a conference report on the bill of the House No. 7035, making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The conference report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 49 and 50.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 60; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 63: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 63, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In line 23 of said amendment, after the word "including," insert the words "one-half of;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 66: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 66, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Add at the close of the amendment, as a new section, the following:

"SEC. 6. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to sell to the highest bidder, at public auction, and under the provisions of section 3 of this act, the following, namely: All the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to a certain parcel of land in the square south of square 181, in said city of Washington, described as follows, to wit: Beginning at a point on the north side of N street northwest, 48 feet 2 inches west of the west line of Sixteenth street; running thence along N street westerly eighteen feet; thence northerly 62.14 feet to Massachusetts avenue; thence southeasterly along said avenue 19.69 feet; thence 54.27 feet south to the point of beginning on N street. The proceeds of sale to be applied to the use mentioned in section 3."

T. R. COBB,
JO. C. S. BLACKBURN,
FRANK HISCOCK,
Managers on the part of the House.
R. E. WITHERS,
ISHAM G. HARRIS,
WM. WINDOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Statement in explanation of the report upon the nineteen amendments that remained open, namely:

By action on amendment 11 the amount appropriated is decreased $40,000.

By action on amendments 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, for maintaining the jail, the appropriations for the employés, &c., is dropped out.

By action on amendments 24, 25, 27, and 28, the office of treasurer is abolished, and a system of book-keeping is provided for in the assessor and collector's office.

By action on amendment 26, the special assessment division is abolished.

By action on amendment 27, the appropriation remains in gross sum as originally fixed by the House.

By action on amendments 49 and 50, the location of the high school provided for in the bill is fixed on the southeast part of square 446, as provided in the original bill as passed by the House.

By action on amendment 63, provision is made for the depositing the revenues of the District in the Treasury of the United States, and the manner in which they shall be drawn therefrom, and that the General Government shall be liable for one-half of all general taxes paid in drawback certificates as required by the act approved June 27, 1879.

By action on amendment 66, section 7 of the act of March 2, 1867, which exempts from taxation the buildings, grounds, rents, revenues, &c., of the same, of the joint stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington, and the commissioners of the District are authorized to sell the right, title, and interest of certain parcel of land in square south of square 181 in the city of Washington.

THOS. R. COBB,
JO. C. S. BLACKBURN,
FRANK HISCOCK,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. COBB. I demand the previous question upon the adoption of the conference report.

The main question was ordered; under the operation of which the report of the conference committee was agreed to.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. COX. I move to suspend the rules and put upon its passage the bill which I send to the desk. It is the bill as to the apportionment of Representatives, having in it the number 307 and the two sections of the original bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask the gentleman from New York if he will not withhold that motion for the present to allow the message of the President just received to be read?

Mr. KEIFER. We demand a second on the motion of the gentleman from New York to suspend the rules. If the gentleman will put the number at 319 we will pass the bill.

Mr. COX. I have made my motion to pass the bill with the fairest number possible.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 3292) granting a pension to Sally M. Buchanan, widow of General Robert C. Buchanan, United States Army.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the committee of conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BECK, Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, and Mr. WINDOM, as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask that the message from the President received this morning be taken from the Speaker's table and laid before the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] yield for that purpose?

Mr. COX. I do.

VETO OF REFUNDING BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

Having considered the bill entitled "An act to facilitate the refunding of the national debt," I am constrained to return it to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with the following statement of my objections to its passage.

The imperative necessity for prompt action, and the pressure of public duties in this closing week of my term of office, compel me to refrain from any attempt to make a full and satisfactory presentation of the objections to the bill.

The importance of the passage at the present session of Congress of a suitable measure for the refunding of the national debt, which is about to mature, is generally recognized. It has been urged upon the attention of Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury and in my last annual message. If successfully accomplished, it will secure a large decrease in the annual interest payment of the nation; and I earnestly recommend, if the bill before me shall fail, that another measure for this purpose be adopted before the present Congress adjourns.

While in my opinion it would be wise to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to offer to the public bonds bearing 3½ per cent. interest in aid of refunding, I should not deem it my duty to interpose my constitutional objection to the passage of the present bill if it did not contain, in its fifth section, provisions which in my judgment seriously impair the value and tend to the destruction of the present national-banking system of the country. This system has now been in operation almost twenty years. No safer or more beneficial banking system was ever established. Its advantages as a business are free to all who have the necessary capital. It furnishes a currency to the public which for convenience and the security of the bill-holder has probably never been equaled by that of any other banking system. Its notes are secured by the deposit with the Government of the interest-bearing bonds of the United States.

The section of the bill before me which relates to the national-banking system, and to which objection is made, is not an essential part of a refunding measure. It is as follows:

SEC. 5. From and after the 1st day of July, 1881, the 3 per cent. bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation, or as security for the safe-keeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with such banks; but when any such bonds deposited for the purposes aforesaid shall be designated for purchase or redemption by the Secretary of the Treasury, the banking association depositing the same shall have the right to substitute other issues of the bonds of the United States in lieu thereof: Provided, That no bond upon which interest has ceased shall be accepted or shall be continued on deposit as security for circulation or for the safe-keeping of the public money; and in case bonds so deposited shall not be withdrawn, as provided by law, within thirty days after interest has ceased thereon, the banking association depositing the same shall be subject to the liabilities and proceedings on the part of the Comptroller provided for in section 5234 of the Revised Statutes of the United States: And provided further, That section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874, entitled "An act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of the national-bank currency, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and sections 5159 and 5160 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same are hereby, re-enacted.

Under this section it is obvious that no additional banks will hereafter be organized, except possibly in a few cities or localities where the prevailing rates of interest in ordinary business are extremely low. No new banks can be organized, and no increase of the capital of existing banks can be obtained except by the purchase and deposit of 3 per cent. bonds. No other bonds of the United States can be used for the purpose. The one thousand millions of other bonds recently issued by the United States, and bearing a higher rate of interest than 3 per cent., and therefore a better security for the bill-holder, cannot, after the 1st of July next, be received as security for bank circulation. This is a radical change in the banking law. It takes from the banks the right they have heretofore had under the law to purchase and deposit, as security for their circulation, any of the bonds issued by the United States, and deprives the bill-holder of the best security which the banks are able to give, by requiring them to deposit bonds having the least value of any bonds issued by the Government.

The average rate of taxation of capital employed in banking is more than double the rate of taxation upon capital employed in other legitimate business. Under these circumstances, to amend the banking law so as to deprive the banks of the privilege of securing their notes by the most valuable bonds issued by the Government will, it is believed, in a large part of the country, be a practical prohibition of the organization of new banks, and prevent the existing banks from enlarging their capital. The national banking system, if continued at all, will be a monopoly in the hands of those already engaged in it, who may purchase Government bonds bearing a more favorable rate of interest than the 3 per cent. bonds prior to next July.

To prevent the further organization of banks is to put in jeopardy the whole system by taking from it that feature which makes it as it now is, a banking system free upon the same terms to all who wish to engage in it. Even the existing banks will be in danger of being driven from business by the additional disadvantages to which they will be subjected by this bill. In short, I cannot but regard the fifth section of the bill as a step in the direction of the destruction of the national-banking system.

Our country, after a long period of business depression, has just entered upon a career of unexampled prosperity.

The withdrawal of the currency from circulation of the national banks and the enforced winding up of the banks in consequence, would inevitably bring serious embarrassment and disaster to the business of the country. Banks of issue are essential instruments of modern commerce. If the present efficient and admirable system of banking is broken down, it will inevitably be followed by a recurrence to other and inferior methods of banking. Any measure looking to such a result will be a disturbing element in our financial system. It will destroy confidence and surely check the growing prosperity of the country.

Believing that a measure for refunding the national debt is not necessarily connected with the national-banking law, and that any refunding act would defeat its own object if it imperiled the national-banking system or seriously impaired its usefulness; and convinced that section 5 of the bill before me would, if it should become a law, work great harm, I herewith return the bill to the House of Representatives for that further consideration which is provided for in the Constitution.

RUTHERFORD B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 3, 1881.

An act to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all existing provisions of law authorizing the refunding of the national debt shall apply to any bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 4½ per cent. per annum which may hereafter become redeemable: Provided, That in lieu of the bonds authorized to be issued by the act of July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and the acts amendatory thereto, and the certificates authorized by the act of February 26, 1879, entitled "An act to authorize the issue of certificates of deposit in aid of the refunding of the public debt," the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue bonds to an amount not exceeding $400,000,000, of denominations of $50, or some multiple of that sum, which shall bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, after five years, and payable twenty years from the date of issue; and also Treasury notes to an amount not exceeding $300,000,000, in denominations of $10, or some multiple of that sum, not exceeding $1,000, either registered or coupon, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after one year, and payable in ten years from the date of issue; and no Treasury note of a less denomination than $100 shall be registered. The bonds and Treasury notes shall be, in all other respects, of like character and subject to the same provisions as the bonds authorized to be issued by the act of July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and acts amendatory thereto: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize an increase of the public debt: Provided further, That interest upon the 6 per cent. bonds hereby authorized to be refunded shall cease at the expiration of thirty days after publication of notice that the same have been designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for redemption. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to authorize public subscriptions, at not less than par, to be received at all depositories of the United States, and at all national banks, and such other banks as he may designate, for the bonds and for the Treasury notes herein provided for, for thirty days before he shall contract for or award any portion of said bonds or Treasury notes to any syndicate of individuals or bankers, or otherwise than under such public subscriptions; and if it shall happen that more than the entire amount of said bonds and Treasury notes, or of either of them, has been subscribed within said thirty days, he shall award the full amount subscribed to all persons who shall have made bona fide subscriptions for the sum of $2,000 or less, at rates most advantageous to the United States, and the residue ratably among the subscribers in proportion to the amount by them respectively subscribed, at rates most advantageous to the United States.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in the process of refunding the national debt, to exchange, at not less than par, any of the bonds or Treasury notes herein authorized for any of the bonds of the United States outstanding and uncalled bearing a higher rate of interest than 4½ per cent. per annum; and on the bonds so redeemed the Secretary of the Treasury may allow to the holders the difference between the interest on such bonds from the date of exchange to the time of their maturity, and the interest for a like period on the bonds or Treasury notes issued; and the bonds so received and exchanged in pursuance of the provisions of this act shall be canceled and destroyed; but none of the provisions of this act shall apply to the redemption or exchange of any of the bonds issued to the Pacific Railway Companies.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to make suitable rules and regulations to carry this act into effect; and the expense of preparing, issuing, advertising, and disposing of the bonds and Treasury notes authorized to be issued shall not exceed one-half of 1 per cent.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, if in his opinion it shall become necessary, to use temporarily not exceeding $50,000,000 of the standard gold and silver coin in the Treasury in the redemption of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds of the United States authorized to be refunded by the provisions of this act, which shall from to time be repaid and replaced out of the proceeds of the sale of the bonds or Treasury notes authorized by this act; and he may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of the United States bonds or Treasury notes authorized by this act: Provided, That the bonds and Treasury notes so purchased or redeemed shall constitute no part of the sinking fund, but shall be canceled.

SEC. 5. From and after the 1st day of July, 1881, the 3 per cent. bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation, or as security for the safe-keeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with such banks; but when any such bonds deposited for the purposes aforesaid shall be designated for purchase or redemption by the Secretary of the Treasury, the banking association depositing the same shall have the right to substitute other issues of the bonds of the United States in lieu thereof: Provided, That no bond upon which interest has ceased shall be accepted or shall be continued on deposit as security for circulation or for the safe-keeping of the public money; and in case bonds so deposited shall not be withdrawn, as provided by law, within thirty days after interest has ceased thereon, the banking association depositing the same shall be subject to the liabilities and proceedings on the part of the Comptroller provided for in section 5234 of the Revised Statutes of the United States: And provided further, That section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874, entitled "An act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of the national-bank currency, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and sections 5159 and 5160 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same are hereby, re-enacted.

SEC. 6. That the payment of any of the bonds hereby authorized, after the expiration of five years, shall be made in amounts to be determined from time to time by the Secretary of the Treasury at his discretion, the bonds so to be paid to be distinguished and described by the dates and numbers, beginning for each successive payment with the bonds of each class last dated and numbered; of the time of which intended payment or redemption the Secretary of the Treasury shall give public notice, and the interest on the particular bonds so selected at any time to be paid shall cease at the expiration of thirty days from publication of such notice.

SEC. 7. That this act shall be known as "The funding act of 1881;" and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. TUCKER. I move that the message of the President be printed and that it do lie upon the table, subject to be called up at a future time for consideration.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the President's message.

The SPEAKER. It is usual to proceed to consider immediately a veto message unless a motion is made to postpone. The clause in the Digest showing what is the practice will be read.

Mr. ROBESON. The motion to proceed to consider is a privileged motion. It has been so decided.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever a bill is returned to the House with the objections of the President, it is usual to have the message containing his objections immediately read—Journals, 1, 28, pp. 1081, 1084; 1, 29, pp. 1209, 1214; 2, 33, pp. 397, 411; 1, 34, p. 1420; and for the House to proceed to the reconsideration of the bill—Ibid.—or to postpone its consideration for a future day.—Ibid., 1, 21, p. 742. But not where less than a quorum is present.—Ibid., 33, p. 1341. A veto message and a bill may be referred, or the message alone, and the bill may be laid on the table.—Journal, 2, 27, pp. 1253, 1254, 1256, 1257; Congressional Globe, same session, p. 875.

The main question in the consideration of a vetoed bill is, "Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass the bill?"—Journals, 2, 27, p. 1051; 1, 28, p. 1085; 1, 29, p. 1218, &c.

Mr. COX. I yielded the floor only temporarily. I did not yield for any motion or debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion of the gentleman from Virginia if it is made.

Mr. ROBESON. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman from Virginia make?

Mr. TUCKER. I move that the President's message be printed and lie on the table subject to be called up hereafter.

Mr. ROBESON. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that we proceed to the reconsideration of the funding bill just returned with the objection of the President, and I claim that is a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion. He will also entertain the motion to postpone, which is substantially the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. TUCKER. I move to postpone.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. CONGER. It will save time to have the yeas and nays, and I demand them.

Mr. ROBESON. We want to consider immediately; because we can still have a funding bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Chair please state the question again?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to postpone the present consideration.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 138, nays 116, not voting 36; as follows:

So the motion of Mr. TUCKER was agreed to.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. JAMES with Mr. O'BRIEN, until further notice.

Mr. O'CONNOR with Mr. HOUK, until further notice, both being ill.

Mr. WAIT with Mr. JOHNSTON, for this legislative day, Mr. JOHNSTON being confined to his room by severe illness.

Mr. HISCOCK with Mr. WELLS, on this vote.

Mr. HENDERSON with Mr. TOWNSHEND of Illinois, on all political questions, for the remainder of the session.

Mr. STEPHENS with Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. GOODE with Mr. LORING.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. TUCKER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I now call up my motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I desire to ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. COFFROTH. I rise to make a privileged report.

Mr. SPEAKER. The pending motion is a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I believe that motion has not yet been submitted.

Mr. COX. I submitted the motion some time ago, but yielded to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] to call up the President's message.

Mr. COFFROTH. I desire to make a privileged report.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

Mr. COX. I cannot yield now. I have modified my motion and reduced it to writing and ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

To suspend the rules so as to consider the apportionment bill, and that a vote be taken on the numbers 322, 319, 315, and 307 in the order stated; and, when a majority shall agree upon any number, that the bill with the second and third sections of the original bill be put upon its passage without debate or dilatory motions.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that even under a motion to suspend the rules this House cannot compel members to vote or not to vote, to use dilatory motions or not to use them. A motion to suspend the rules must be to do something within the power of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is a motion to suspend all rules.

Mr. CONGER. To do something within the constitutional rights of members.

The SPEAKER. The motion is a legitimate motion, one known to the rules, a motion which the Chair is bound to recognize. Whether it is a proper motion in substance or subject is a matter for the discretion of the House, for the judgment of the members of the House.

Mr. CONGER. Suppose the gentleman had included in his motion a proposition that the minority should not vote.

The SPEAKER. Well, it would be in the discretion of the House.

Mr. CONGER. It would, eh?

The SPEAKER. That would be so absurd that the Chair will not respond.

Mr. CONGER. Well, this proposition says there shall be no more dilatory motions.

The SPEAKER. The motion is a legitimate one known to the rules.

Mr. CONGER. I asked the question of the Chair in good faith in order to see how far this could go, to see what motions could be submitted controlling the actions of the members of this House.

The SPEAKER. The remedy with the House is to vote it down. The Chair does not think that he has any right to rule out a proposition touching a subject on which a motion is in order.

Mr. CONGER. Let the proposition be read again. I think the Chair could not have heard that portion of the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may not have understood it entirely.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be read again.

The proposition of Mr. COX was again read.

Mr. KEIFER. There is too much of that.

Mr. ROBINSON. The last portion would be entirely inoperative. "The bill shall be put on its passage" is enough; that will require a vote upon it. Certainly nobody claims that there is any power to compel gentlemen to vote if they wish to refrain from voting. I submit to the gentleman from New York that the last part of his proposition would be entirely inoperative.

Mr. COX. It applies only to the consciences of men.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, you had better let their consciences alone.

Mr. COX. I will strike out the last part of it.

The SPEAKER. The proposition will be again read as modified.

The proposition as modified was read, as follows:

To suspend the rules so as to consider the apportionment bill, and that a vote be taken on the numbers 322, 319, 315, and 307 in the order stated; and, when a majority shall agree upon any number, that the bill, with the second and third sections of the original bill, be put upon its passage without debate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Now let the sections referred to be read, so that the House may know what they are.

Mr. COX. I ask that the bill having the number 307 in it be read.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let the two sections referred to be read, so that we may understand them.

Mr. COX. I ask that sections 2 and 3 be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That whenever a new State shall be admitted into the Union the Representative or Representatives assigned to it shall be additional to the number herein provided for.

SEC. 3. That in each State entitled under this apportionment the number to which such State may be entitled in the Forty-eighth and each subsequent Congress shall be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants, and equal in number to the Representatives to which each State may be entitled in Congress, no one district electing more than one Representative.

Mr. COX. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. CALKINS. Is this a motion to suspend the rules and consider merely, or a motion to suspend and pass?

Mr. COX. To consider the four numbers I have named, and have a vote on them.

Mr. CALKINS. I understand that the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is that there shall be no dilatory motions.

Mr. COX. That portion is stricken out.

The SPEAKER. There could be under the rule but one motion to adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to know whether if this motion to suspend the rules should prevail, there will then be a vote by which a majority can pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there would be.

Mr. CONGER. Then we do not propose to let it come to that point.

The SPEAKER. This is a motion to suspend the rules to consider.

Mr. CONGER. But it compels a vote upon several numbers, and it requires that the number which the majority may adopt shall be part of the bill.

Mr. COX. That is the advantage you have. I give gentlemen on the other side that advantage at their own request, or the request of many of them.

Mr. CONGER. That proposition was made to the committee of the two sides, and was rejected. The gentleman knows it.

Mr. COX. This is not the same proposition.

Mr. CONGER. It is the same proposition.

Mr. COX. Oh, no; I have them here.

Mr. CONGER. So have I.

Mr. COX. There is a different order.

Mr. CONGER. It is the same proposition on which the two sides failed absolutely to agree.

Mr. COX. Not on this proposition.

Mr. CONGER. Substantially the same. Now they come in and want a suspension of the rules to compel us to take the bill up.

Mr. COX. I must correct the gentleman——

Mr. MARSH. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARSH. I desire to know, if this motion prevails, whether when the vote comes upon 322 or upon 319, or any lower number, it will be within the power of members of the House to refuse to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not like to decide that until members do refuse to vote. But he does not know how he could make members vote if they did not wish to do so.

Mr. REED. The Chair is familiar with such matters.

Mr. CONGER. I have here the proposition of the gentleman to the committee——

Mr. BLAND. I object to debate. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. CONGER. It is in writing too.

Mr. COX. The numbers are not in the same order.

The SPEAKER. On the question of suspending the rules the gentleman from New York has called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONGER. I demand that the question be taken by tellers on seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. ERRETT and Mr. COX were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 132, noes 72.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. There are now fifteen minutes on each side for debate.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the resolution offered by the gentlemen from New York should be adopted, would we proceed to vote upon the several propositions contained in the resolution under the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER. The House would proceed to vote on the several numbers, as directed to be voted upon in the words of the resolution.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the rules should be suspended under the proposition made by the gentleman from New York, the House, as I understand, would come to a vote first on 322; if a majority should vote against 322, then the question would be taken on 319; if a majority should vote against 319, then there would be a vote on 315; and then on 307.

The SPEAKER. That is the order.

Mr. PAGE. That we would be compelled to do if the rules should be suspended under the gentleman's motion.

The SPEAKER. That would be the order of voting. The Clerk will now call the roll.

Mr. KEIFER. I thought debate was in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear any one claiming the right to debate the proposition, although he gave notice that there were fifteen minutes on each side for debate under the rules. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. COX. If anybody claims the floor for debate on the other side, I claim the right to respond; otherwise I have no wish to speak.

Mr. ROBESON. Having been named first on the list in the debate on the bill, am I not entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SHERWIN] as controlling the matter on his side of the House. [Cries of "That is right!"]

Mr. COX. I shall claim the concluding quarter of an hour.

Mr. SHERWIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not expect at this time in the fifteen minutes at my disposal to be able to say anything which will change the opinions of gentlemen upon the questions before the House. I will however refer to a few things which tend, as I think, to obscure and distort the subject. It would seem as though there was no end to the confusion which arises out of questions of arithmetic, the chance of shifting fractions. No gentleman can claim that there is any injustice per se in any of the numbers which have been suggested, whether 293, 301, 307, 311, 319, or 322. No unfairness can be detected anywhere, except as you make it a political question. Three hundred and eleven is as fair as 319, except for the politics involved in it; but even those who have declared upon this floor that politics ought to have nothing to do with it have said that 311 was unfair. Gentlemen upon the other side and gentlemen upon this side who have determined to eschew politics have dropped 311. Why did they abandon it? It was not unfair mathematically. Gentlemen have confessed what many of us have from the first asserted that it is a political question. Then, having made that confession, where can you stop except at that point which is in fact fair politically? I believe I demonstrated in my first speech that we could not stop short of 319 if we wish to secure political fairness. My position has not been assailed. I again assume it, with the additional remark that I think 322 is still nearer to political exactness. But we have not asked for that, as we believed that you who have the majority would not give it to us. We thought you would accept 319 as fair, but it was a vain hope.

I wish to make a few more observations in regard to fractions and the part they have played here in this discussion.

And first I will say that the object of an apportionment is not to represent fractions. They are but an incident. Washington and all the early statesmen of our country claimed that only whole ratios could be represented. That was the uniform policy and practice of Congress until 1840, and not until then was any fraction allowed a Representative, no matter how unjust it seemed to be in some cases. Then the policy changed, and fractions greater than one-half were allowed a Representative, and since then the strife has been on the part of different States to secure, by means of fractions, greater representation than they were entitled to.

In the light of the early practice of Congress, and in the very nature of apportionment, that number is best which requires the least number of Representatives to be given to fractions and which represents the most whole numbers. If a number could be found which would so divide the population of the different States that all the fractions were less than one-half of a ratio, that would be the best number we could find; for no one would claim that such small fractions should be represented. Then, again, if we could find a number which when applied to the population of the States would only leave, say, three fractions greater than one-half and all of the others less than one-half, that number would be more in consonance with the true theory of apportionment than another number which would leave, say, twenty-five or thirty fractions greater than one-half, and so requiring so many Representatives to be given on their account.

It follows from this that the argument so much used here, that that number which leaves the least unrepresented fractions is the best, is fallacious. For instance, suppose one number gives us ten fractions greater than one-half and entitled to a Representative for each, and that the fractions in each of the other twenty-eight States amounted to 50,000 or 1,400,000 unrepresented fractions in the aggregate, would not that be nearer to equity as well as to theory than to choose a number which would cause twenty-eight fractions greater than a half and ten less than a half, with 500,000 people unrepresented? For, in the first instance, there would be only ten States instead of twenty-eight which would get a representation for a fraction, although the aggregate of unrepresented fractions would be nearly three times as great in the first case as in the last, but they would be distributed over many States, and the situation would approximate the case where no fractions at all would be represented, which we have seen is the desirable thing if it could be compassed.

To illustrate in another form this fallacy that the number which leaves the least unrepresented fractions is most desirable, I call your attention to the fact that the number 311, which has been at last conceded to be unjust, leaves 641,477 people in the aggregate unrepresented, while the number which our unpartisan friends have pitched upon leaves 658,844 people unrepresented, showing upon that principle that 311 is the best number, as it represents 17,367 more people than 307. The number 322 is better than 307, for at 322 only 645,390 people are unrepresented, which is 13,454 less people unrepresented than there are at 307.

To show what the situation is with regard to the States which have represented and unrepresented fractions, I will state that at 301 there are ten Northern and eight Southern States which have unrepresented fractions, while seven Southern and eleven Northern States have Representatives on account of them.

At 307 there are fourteen Northern and six Southern States which have unrepresented fractions, while there are nine Southern and seven Northern States which are represented by fractions.

At 319 there are eleven Northern and nine Southern States with unrepresented fractions, and six Southern and ten Northern States which have Representatives for fractions.

Having said so much about the uncertainties and confusion caused by fractions, and the fallacies that are supported by them, I will add that it seems to me that there are two cases in which Congress might relax its rule in the furtherance of justice, that is in the case of small States which ought to have every benefit they can obtain from them, and new States, or those fast increasing in population. States like Rhode Island, Vermont, and Connecticut on the one hand, and Texas, Kansas, Nebraska, and Minnesota on the other, as probably within a year or two each of the last four States will have increased sufficiently to entitle them to another Representative. I give in tabular form an exhibit of unrepresented fractions heretofore referred to:

Amount of unrepresented fractions at 307	658,844
Amount of unrepresented fractions at 304	630,078
Amount of unrepresented fractions at 311	641,477
Amount of unrepresented fractions at 322	645,390

It will be seen by the above table that if the lowest aggregate of unrepresented fractions is to be our guide, the order of the numbers should be 304, 311, 322 and 307.

A calculation was furnished the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] by Mr. Smiley, of the Smithsonian Institution, which was published February 12, and a subsequent table in the RECORD of March 2. The gentleman is an accomplished mathematician, but his tables and those of the distinguished statistician of the Treasury Department, Mr. Elliott, given to us by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] have started from erroneous premises. I do not know as gentlemen of this House have the time or is it necessary to enter into an extended analysis of those tables and those furnished by the Census Bureau. I wish to remind statisticians again that it is not a question of pure mathematics, and we do not expect to be ground to powder in the mill of circulating decimals. I shall at this time content myself with pointing out some inconsistencies in them.

I have already shown that the amount of unrepresented fractions at certain numbers are three or four times as large as given in the first of the tables mentioned. The first tables mentioned are upon a division of the States into four groups, East, West, South, and the Pacific, which are not chosen so as to represent the true object of the apportionment. The next tables are upon groups of States on the basis of republican, democratic, and doubtful States. It appears from the last tables that the most accurate number upon a division into republican, democratic, and doubtful is 307, and that the republican States are those which have the advantage. This is termed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] "almost exquisite."

Three hundred and two is the next best number, varying but a trifle from 307, and might be called charming, as it is so accurate mathematically, and gives the South but 5 advantage over the North.

Three hundred and eight should be equally fascinating to the democracy, as it also gives them a net gain of 5.

Three hundred and eighteen comes fourth in desirableness mathematically, but it could never be adopted, as at that number the South has but 1 majority.

Now, to refer to another table in the first column of the fourth page of the RECORD of March 2 upon the basis of North and South. I wish to remark that there is a fallacy in the proportions used, in this, that he has taken as his second term in both proportions numbers that are not accurate in themselves and are a part of the problem upon which we are at work, and must be found, independently, the same as the fourth terms of his proportions, and cannot be assumed, and they do not give correct proportions. The true method to ascertain the proportional amount of representation for the sections is to take the proportion of the population of the North and the South to the whole population. That is, for the South .3748, and the North .6252.

Upon that basis, at 307, the South is entitled to 115.06 of the representation and the North to 191.94. That is, the South really has 9,648 people unrepresented, while the North has a representation for the same number of people, which it does not possess.

At 302, upon the same basis, the South is entitled to 113.19 of the representation, and the North to 188.81. That is, the South has 31,059 people unrepresented, while the North has the same number of people which it does not have, yet, notwithstanding this, the South has a net gain of 1 more, making 5 over the North.

The next singular thing is, that at 318, where the South has but 1 majority, the South is entitled to 119.19, and the North to 198.81; that is, the South has no representation for 29,497 of her people, while the North gains them. That is, a change of 19,849 people over all the country leaves the South but 1 majority instead of 4.

When we examine these questions in the light of pure mathematics we see, as I have shown, that if you choose the number which leaves the most unrepresented fractions, we must take not only 304, but the numbers which are asserted to be shockingly unfair, namely, 311 and 322, before we accept 307. If we take the theory of proportional representation in its strict sense as between sections, then you allow a difference of less than 20,000 people scattered over the whole country to make a difference of 3 members as between the North and South.

Again, dividing the States upon the basis of republican, democratic, and doubtful, 307 is the best number by pure mathematics upon the small margin stated as before. While upon a basis of East, West, South, and Pacific there are six other numbers better than 307, as shown by the first tables of Mr. Smiley.

After this exhibition of the jugglery of figures, shall we stand here enmeshed in their fallacies, or shall we treat it as it is, as a political question? Every one of these numbers when chosen is fair and true by arithmetic and in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution.

To those who feel like yielding to arithmetic pure and simple, I would say you cannot vote for 307. You must choose 304, 311, or 322 first.

To those who desire equity, I would reiterate, it is found at 319.

It deprives no State or section of any representation it is entitled to, and I for one shall stand by that number and shall oppose in every way the adoption of any smaller number than that.

I append to my remarks on the apportionment bill two tables prepared at my request by Mr. T. L. De Land, of the Treasury Department:

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the following proceedings took place:

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair.) The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WHITE. How much more time is allowed on this side of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has exhausted the fifteen minutes allowed on that side. The gentleman from New York is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERWIN. I ask leave to print some tables, in connection with this matter, in the RECORD.

There was no objection.]

Mr. WHITE. I ask consent to print some remarks on this subject.

There was no objection. [See Appendix.]

Mr. COX. I now yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, after the long political wrangle that we have endured here for so many days and weeks on this bill, I am gratified to find that the members on both sides of the House are willing now to lay aside all political or sectional prejudices and unite in voting for the adoption of what I hope will prove to be a fair, just, and equitable apportionment bill.

While I consider the two numbers presented by gentlemen upon the other side as somewhat out of the way, and especially the number 322, as giving to one section of the country, looking at it in a sectional point of view, undue political advantage and an undue power both in the House and electoral college, still I am willing, for the sake of harmony, to have a vote taken upon both propositions in their order. I hope that I may have the attention of the House in the few moments which I shall devote to this question, because what I have to say is for the purpose of trying to reach the consideration of this bill and to induce all members of the House to unite in the enactment of a law upon some equitable basis.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is our constitutional duty at this session of Congress to pass an apportionment bill, and I know that no apportionment bill can be passed unless it is felt to be reasonably fair, reasonably just, and equitable to both sides of the House, and to all sections of the country. I believe the numbers which have been presented on our side, either of which if adopted by the House would meet the approval of the country, are perfectly fair and just to all sections as well as to all the States. As far as the number 315 is concerned, it was introduced by myself as a compromise between the number 311 and 319, which were presented originally by the majority and minority of the committee, and which were distasteful to gentlemen respectively on both sides of the House. Three hundred and fifteen, the number proposed in my amendment, was four numbers greater than 311, proposed by the majority of the committee, and four numbers less than 319, proposed by the minority. It was a compromise between these extremes, and it certainly is as fair and equitable a distribution of political power between the sections of the country as in my judgment can possibly be reached.

As far as the number 307 is concerned, we have assurance from the highest authority and from calculations that have been carefully made and presented to the committee from the Census Bureau itself, from General Walker, who has devoted a great deal of time and attention to the consideration of it—I say we have assurances from him that this number 307 (upon which and 315 we ask a vote) is almost magic in its equal division of political power in this country between the two sections and among the States. And we can give assurances to gentlemen on all sides of the House who are opposed to the passage of such a proposition, that if the two numbers or either of them that we propose be adopted, they at least shall not suffer, nor shall there be thereby any unfair distribution of political power to themselves or their sections.

I would like to say to the House and to our friends upon both sides that, while so far as I am individually concerned, having investigated this question as far as I was capable of investigating it, having done all that I could possibly do to try and effect a compromise between the conflicting opinions of the two sides of the House, in the position in which they honored me with, I am willing to accept these numbers or either of them, because it enables us to frame a bill and to arrive at a fair conclusion in reference to a matter which has been the source of so much controversy. By fixing the number either at 315 or 307, either of which is perfectly fair to the majority and to the minority, we establish a just, equitable, and reasonable basis, and I think it ought to be accepted. I wish to say right here if any member upon our side refuses to vote for these 307 or 315 members, he does injustice to himself as well as to his section; because, while it gives us no political advantage, it nevertheless treats all with perfect fairness and justice. They obey also the mandate of the Constitution which declares that this bill shall be passed. The Constitution says this bill ought to be passed, and the interests of the country, upon grounds of economy, absolutely demand that it shall be passed immediately, for the reason that nineteen States in the Union whose Legislatures are in session are waiting to act upon it, which action cannot be had except at a tremendous expense to the people if further delay is to be had here, necessitating extra sessions of these nineteen Legislatures.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX. I now yield three minutes to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, while this proposition by the gentleman from New York to suspend the rules is not just what I would like, I shall vote for it. I do not see in it the danger that was feared by gentlemen upon this side of the Chamber when it was first stated.

This is substantially the proposition to which the republicans, in the conference recently had, assented with the sole exception that we are now called to vote upon four numbers instead of upon all the numbers consecutively from 322 down to 301. This proposition does not commit the republican side of this House to vote at all upon any number under 322 or 319, unless we choose to do it. The proposition simply declares that we shall now without debate vote upon 322, 319, 315, if we desire, 307 if we desire; and if a majority of this House shall agree upon either number, then the bill without debate shall be put upon its passage. We reserve the right, as that side of the House always has reserved the right, and I take it always will, to refuse to vote if for any reason the bill or proposition presented seems inimical to the public interests or wholly unsatisfactory as a measure calculated to subserve the public good.

Now, Mr. Speaker, 319 is absolutely less fair to this side of the House than it is to the other. I claim that apportionment should be based upon population alone. I waive all other considerations now. We will apportion, whether in this Congress or the next, on population; we will apportion under the present census upon figures and statistics now before us. The North, consisting of twenty-two States, has gained 2,000,000 people more than the South in ten years. The North has 187 members in this House now, and the South, sixteen States, has 106 members. Now, if the South, with 106 members, gains 13, as it does under the 319 bill, will any man tell me that the North, with 187 members, ought not to gain 13, with 2,000,000 more of an increase of population in the last ten years? Will any gentleman say that is unfair? If it is, it is unfair to the North, not to the South. But the republicans want apportionment now, and we waive the political advantages of a House of Representatives larger than 319, and have reason to hope that some of our democratic friends will yield in turn the political advantages of a smaller House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX. The people of this country do not make very much account of a small addition of members to this body. Whether we increase our body by seven or ten or twenty members, they will not retrograde. Still the general sentiment is against any considerable increase.

But the people are interested in carrying out the provisions of the Constitution, namely, that the Representatives shall be apportioned according to the number of the people. They believe that such a roll of members should be given as will come nearest to the true representation of the people. I am more particular as to some number being fixed at this session than that my favorite should be named.

The number 307, as the authentic tables show, is nearer than any other named. It is nearer than either of the other three numbers pending in this proposition. With that number, 307, there will only be 279,000 people unrepresented in our whole population of over fifty millions. With 319 there will be 10,000 more unrepresented. With 322 there will be 709,000 unrepresented. With 315 there will be about four hundred and fifty-five thousand unrepresented. The tables heretofore printed show the exact details in this connection. I refer to these tabular and other statements as ample testimony in behalf of the best number.

The fairness of the number 307 abundantly appears, and still more explicitly from the calculations to which I referred in my published remarks, and which appeared in the letters of Mr. Smiley of the "Smithsonian," and other statements approved by General Walker, Superintendent of the Census.

This statement comes with the approval of your own Superintendent. It is based on the authentic returns. I said your Superintendent of the Census, because he belongs to your party, gentlemen. We ought to be proud of the returns made under his superintendence and their authenticity. We should stand by him when he gives a fair count, as well from his subordinates as by arithmetic, so as to fix this apportionment aright. I say General Walker made the ciphering upon which I base my number, 307.

With the number 307 the old free States, with a population of 30,865,000 by the present census, will gain eighteen hundredths of a Congressman. The old slave States, with more than a population of 18,504,000, with 307 will lose one hundred and seven one-thousandth parts of a Congressman. You cannot get nearer to a nice and adequate representation.

If anybody can imagine the thousandth part of a Congressman they can perhaps understand it, but it is almost impossible. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBESON. That depends upon the size of the Congressman. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. Square men do not reckon size against other qualities.

And now take these figures; what do you find as to political relations? Take the republican States, the democratic States, and six doubtful States, that have gone both ways in the last few years. What do you find? Why, that 307 is the number nearest to exact justice. It stands first in this table; the total political injustice being seventy-eight hundredths.

With 319 there is a political injustice of one and seventy-four hundredths. What does 322 give? It does the greatest political injustice of any number, being last on the long list of computations, the amount of political injustice being four and forty hundredths. The number 319 is seven places lower down in the column than 307 in the order of political fairness.

How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CLYMER.) The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. COX. So that in concluding this long labor, as I hope by a vote on these four numbers, we will have shown to the House what the majority really desire. We will then demonstrate to the country a fairness which has no partisanship and no sectionalism and no distraction by reason of these unrepresented fractions. We come down to the very nicest point possible for representation in a representative body.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON. In the gentleman's bill making 307 the whole number of Representatives he has distributed among the States their respective numbers of Representatives. Now, suppose the House should choose the number 319 or the number 315, it would be necessary, I suggest, that the gentleman change his bill in advance so as to give the further numbers to the different States.

Mr. COX. I am advised of that and shall do that in perfect good faith. I have offered my proposition to attain a definitive vote of a majority here on some number. There is no danger of any jugglery; not on my part, in fixing the representative numbers for the different States. I intend to follow the vote of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have only made the suggestion now in order that by and by there may be no confusion about it.

Mr. COX. I will endeavor with the aid of my friend from Massachusetts and other gentlemen, whatever number be adopted, to put the bill in proper shape. [Here the hammer fell.] I may ask, since my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has not made a full report on behalf of the committee of advisement, that I may be permitted to print with my remarks the propositions made in that committee, so that it may be seen without further disputation whether or not this proposition made to-day is the same as was submitted to the committee.

Mr. CONGER. They have all been printed in the newspapers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time allowed for debate has expired.

Mr. CONGER. On the order of business I wish it to be fully understood that we vote on this proposition with the reservation made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER,] and my own reservation on behalf of myself and my friends, so that there may be no charge of bad faith. That being fully understood, I am in favor of the suspension of the rules for the purpose which has been stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to suspend the rules for the purpose stated.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first proposition before the House to be voted upon is the number 322.

Mr. COX. I suggest that the roll be called on that proposition.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the roll will be called on the several propositions.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBESON. Those in favor of the number 322 will vote "ay," and those opposed will vote "no."

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and there were—yeas 119, noes 132, not voting 39; as follows:

At the conclusion of the second call of the roll,

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, said: I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Did the gentleman respond on either call of the roll?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. I did not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then under the rule the Chair cannot entertain the request.

Mr. KLOTZ. I desire to know how my name is recorded?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the Chair that the name of the gentleman is not recorded as voting.

Mr. KLOTZ. I sate in my seat (to the right of the Chair) when the first call of the roll was made, and did not hear my name called. I then came here (in front of the Chair) and looked at the Clerk all the time he was making the second call so that I might hear my name when called, but there was so much confusion that I did not hear it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The record cannot now be changed.

Mr. KLOTZ. Order ought to be maintained so that members may hear their names when called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the fault of members themselves, not of the Chair.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. HASKELL and others objected.

The Clerk read the names of those voting.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. BLOUNT with Mr. MONROE, during the session of the committee of conference on the sundry civil appropriation bill. If present, Mr. MONROE would vote "ay" and Mr. BLOUNT "no" on the first two propositions.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, with Mr. DUNNELL, on this vote.

Mr. MORSE with Mr. HAZELTON, on this vote.

Mr. WARD with Mr. KENNA, on this vote, both being engaged on the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. ROBESON with Mr. HOOKER, for one hour from one o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The number 322 having failed to receive the votes of a majority of those voting, the question will now be taken on the number 319; upon which the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. Does it require a simple majority to adopt one of the numbers proposed, or does it require the votes of two-thirds of those voting?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A majority simply, under the order of the House.

Mr. WHITE. On this vote those in favor of 319 vote "ay."

The roll was called; and there were—yeas 136, nays 123, not voting 31; as follows:

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. NEAL with Mr. DICKEY, on this vote. If Mr. NEAL were present, Mr. DICKEY would vote "no" and Mr. NEAL "ay."

Mr. AIKEN with Mr. MCGOWAN, on this and the next two votes, Mr. AIKEN favoring 307 and Mr. MCGOWAN 319.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to state that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] is absent on a conference committee.

The SPEAKER. On agreeing to the number 319 the yeas are 136 the nays 123. The ayes have it, and that number is agreed to. [Applause on the republican side.] Under the terms of the resolution providing for the suspension of the rules, 319 will be incorporated in the bill. The question will now be on the bill as thus arranged.

Mr. COX. I intend to carry out the proposition which I made and to abide by the will of the majority of the House, although I cannot vote for the bill in this form. I now send to the desk the bill with the details arranged in accordance with the action just taken by the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read in full, so that every member may know exactly what it contains.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Will it now require a two-thirds vote to pass this bill, or simply a majority?

The SPEAKER. A majority.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I give notice that upon the passage of the bill I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to make an inquiry whether the amendment I offered the other day is a part of the bill to be voted on now?

The SPEAKER. That the gentleman will learn by listening to the reading of the bill. The Chair is not able to answer with certainty the gentleman's question.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 7255) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census.

Be it enacted, &c., That after the 3d day of March, 1883, the House of Representatives shall be composed of 319 members, to be apportioned among the several States as follows: Alabama, 8; Arkansas, 5; California, 6; Colorado, 1; Connecticut, 4; Delaware, 1; Florida, 2; Georgia, 10; Illinois, 20; Indiana, 13; Iowa, 10; Kansas, 6; Kentucky, 11; Louisiana, 6; Maine, 4; Maryland, 6; Massachusetts, 12; Michigan, 11; Minnesota, 5; Mississippi, 7; Missouri, 14; Nebraska, 3; Nevada, 1; New Hampshire, 2; New Jersey, 7; New York, 33; North Carolina, 9; Ohio, 21; Oregon, 1; Pennsylvania, 28; Rhode Island, 2; South Carolina, 6; Tennessee, 10; Texas, 10; Vermont, 2; Virginia, 10; West Virginia, 4; Wisconsin, 8.

SEC. 2. That whenever a new State is admitted to the Union the Representative or Representatives assigned to it shall be added to the number.

SEC. 3. That in each State entitled under this apportionment the number to which such State may be entitled in the Forty-eighth and each subsequent Congress shall be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory, and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants, and equal in number to the Representatives to which such State may be entitled in Congress, no one district electing more than one Representative.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. My amendment was offered as an addition to the third section.

The SPEAKER. It was not offered under the motion to suspend the rules which has been adopted to-day, and it is not before the House.

Mr. WHITE. Was not the amendment of my colleague [Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania] pending?

The SPEAKER. It may have been pending when this subject was up before; but, so far as the Chair could hear from the reading, it is not embraced in the bill which the gentleman from New York now presents to be voted on.

Mr. COX. I have conformed exactly to the proposition I made to the House. That proposition did not include my friend's amendment and was not intended to include it.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I do not understand by what principle, if there is any principle in it, an amendment to the third section of that bill, the bill reported by the minority and not by the chairman of the committee, is excluded at this time.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was pending before the House under its rules; but this bill is now before the House under a suspension of the rules.

[Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. COX. How is the State of Iowa included in the bill?

The SPEAKER. At ten.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Is my amendment now in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Committee on Elections unanimously instructed me to request the House to incorporate in any apportionment bill which might pass the proposition which I now send to the Clerk's desk to be read. I believe it is entirely unobjectionable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that the gentleman from New York can admit his amendment subject to unanimous consent.

Mr. COX. This is not my bill, and I do not propose it as such.

Mr. ROBINSON. The proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot be in order except by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman from New York could not admit it; therefore I wanted to put in the warning at the outset so we might make no mistake.

The SPEAKER. The Chair merely called the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact it might be offered by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. I present the amendment which the Clerk will read under instructions of the Committee on Elections. It relates to filling vacancies in districts occurring by death or resignation.

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

[Cries of "Read!"]

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever there shall be a failure to elect a Representative in Congress in any State or district, or whenever a vacancy in the office of Representative in Congress shall occur in any State or district, a Representative shall be elected or the vacancy filled by the State or district according to the law in force at the time when the original election was or should have been held.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to taking a vote on that amendment, as well as on the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if that be the pleasure of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand there is no objection to the proposition I have offered.

Mr. COX. Let a vote be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as well as on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks that a vote be taken on the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMP. I object.

Mr. WHITE. I hope the gentleman from New York will permit a vote to be taken on my colleague's proposition.

Mr. HAWK. Let the proposition be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reading of the proposition?

Mr. PAGE. I hope not. Let it be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the reading of the proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON. Subject to the right of objection to its introduction.

The SPEAKER. Certainly; subject to the right of objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no county or parish shall be divided in the formation of congressional districts except a county or parish having more than the requisite population for one congressional district, and in all districts composed of more than one county or parish the counties or parishes contiguous to each other having the population nearest to the ratio for a Representative shall be formed into a district.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is an utterly impracticable proposition. I object to it and demand the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is there objection to the proposition I have submitted?

Mr. McCOOK. That may be right enough and probably is, but I object. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] I insist on my objection.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment. Add to the third section the words which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the States are hereby prohibited from forming congressional districts but once under this act, and any such redistricting shall be unlawful and void.

Mr. COOK. I object.

Mr. BAYNE. This shows which side is in favor of gerrymandering and which side is opposed to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Was there objection to my proposition?

Mr. BRAGG. I objected to it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 145, nays 113, not voting 32; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. CHALMERS moved to dispense with the reading of the names.

Objection was made.

The following additional pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. DICKEY with Mr. NEAL, on this vote.

Mr. STEELE with Mr. BOYD, for the remainder of this session, on all political questions.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SHERWIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. LE FEVRE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Agriculture, submitted a report in reference to the Agricultural Department; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LORING obtained the floor.

Mr. REAGAN and Mr. SPRINGER demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. COX. Where does it leave that other morning hour?

The SPEAKER. That is gone. There are quite a number of bills on the Speaker's table, House bills with Senate amendments, which some time in the afternoon ought to be taken up by common consent.

Mr. KENNA. Let me add there are a few bills of the Senate granting pensions which the House ought to act on.

The SPEAKER. There are ten bills of the House with Senate amendments on the Speaker's table and there are about nineteen pension bills on the Speaker's table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 130, noes 17.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the morning hour was dispensed with.

YORKTOWN CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. LORING. I move to suspend the rules and pass joint resolution (S. R. No. 137) to create a commission for the performance of certain duties under an act of Congress providing for the erection of a monument at Yorktown and for the proposed centennial celebration.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That John W. Johnston, of Virginia; E. H. Rollins, of New Hampshire; Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts; H. B. Anthony, of Rhode Island; W. W. Eaton, of Connecticut; W. A. Wallace, of Pennsylvania; Francis Kernan, of New York; T. F. Randolph, of New Jersey; Thomas F. Bayard, of Delaware; W. Pinckney Whyte, of Maryland; Mat. W. Ransom, of North Carolina; M. C. Butler, of South Carolina; Benjamin H. Hill, of Georgia; John Goode, of Virginia; Joshua G. Hall, of New Hampshire; George B. Loring, of Massachusetts; Nelson W. Aldrich, of Rhode Island; Joseph R. Hawley, of Connecticut; Samuel B. Dick, of Pennsylvania; Louis A. Brigham, of New Jersey; Nicholas Muller, of New York; Edward L. Martin, of Delaware; J. Fred C. Talbott, of Maryland; Joseph J. Davis, of North Carolina; John S. Richardson, of South Carolina; and Henry Persons, of Georgia, be, and they are hereby, appointed a commission with full power and authority to discharge all the duties and perform all the functions which were devolved upon them as a joint committee of thirten Senators and thirteen Representatives under the act of Congress approved June 7, 1880, entitled "An act to carry into effect the resolution of Congress adopted on the 29th of October, 1781, in regard to the monumental column at Yorktown, Virginia, and for other purposes."

And the said commission may employ a clerk during the time they are engaged in the performance of said duties, whose compensation shall be at the usual rate of clerks to committees of Congress, and who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and House of Representatives in equal proportions.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the resolution was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to take from the Speaker's table House bills with Senate amendments in the order in which they appear upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. TALBOTT. Is a motion to go to business upon the Speaker's table in order?

Mr. McKENZIE. Is this motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. McKENZIE. Why should this privilege be accorded to these bills?

The SPEAKER. It has preference because it is a motion of a higher privilege. It is in the line of disposing of bills which have passed both Houses of Congress in some form. The motion is to suspend the rules and proceed to consider these bills with Senate amendments.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 120, noes 13.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended in the manner indicated.

INDIANAPOLIS A PORT OF DELIVERY.

The first bill on the Speaker's table with a Senate amendment was the bill (H. R. No. 3520) to establish a port of delivery at Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana.

The Senate amendment was read, as follows:

That Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana, be, and the same is hereby, constituted a port of delivery; and that the privileges of immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise conferred by the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, extended to said port; and there shall be appointed a surveyor of customs to reside at said port, who shall receive a salary, to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, not exceeding $1,000 per annum.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I move concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DE LA MATYR moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURTS, FORT WAYNE, INDIANA.

The next bill on the Speaker's table with Senate amendments was the bill (H. R. No. 2384) amendatory of and supplementary to an act to provide for the holding of terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Fort Wayne, Indiana, approved June 18, 1878.

The Senate amendments were read. They propose to strike out sections 3 and 4, as follows:

SEC. 3. Said district and circuit courts at Fort Wayne shall have exclusive jurisdiction as to the counties of Steuben, La Grange, Elkhart, Porter, Stark, Marshall, Fulton, Kosciusko, Noble, Whitley, De Kalb, Allen, Adams, Wells, Huntington, Wabash, Miami, Cass, Blackford, Grant, and Jay; and said courts shall be limited in territorial jurisdiction to said counties: Provided, That if part of the defendants in any case or proceeding in said courts shall reside without said counties in said State, process issued from and returnable to said courts may be served on such persons by the marshal or any of his deputies.

SEC. 4. In all cases of removal of suits from courts of the State of Indiana, in counties above named, to the courts of the United States in the State of Indiana, such removal shall be to the United States courts held at Fort Wayne as aforesaid; and the time within which the removal shall be perfected, in so far as it refers to or is regulated by the terms of the United States courts, shall be deemed to refer to the terms of the United States courts held at said city of Fort Wayne.

Mr. COLERICK. I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN LANDS IN OHIO.

The next bill on the Speaker's table with Senate amendments was the bill (H. R. No. 3132) to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Ohio.

The Senate amendments were read, as follows:

In line 1, after the word "relinquish," insert "to whom it may concern."

In line 2, after the word "lands," insert "in the State of Ohio."

Strike out all after the word "described," in line 5, down to and including line 19, and insert "in the patent issued therefor by the President, and bearing date the 18th day of April, 1821; and the United States waive and relinquish, for the benefit of whom it may concern, the provision of article 3 of the treaty of September 17, A. D. 1818, between the United States and the Wyandot, Seneca, Shawnee, and Ottawa tribes of Indians, so far only as it concerns the land granted in the eighth article of the treaty referred to in said article 3, to the children of Captain Logan."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, will give his attention.

Mr. CONVERSE. I think this bill does not belong to the Committee on the Public Lands of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Ohio.

Mr. HILL. I would like to inquire who this bill is from?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to say.

Mr. CONVERSE. What is the number of the bill?

The SPEAKER. Three thousand one hundred and thirty-two.

Mr. HILL. I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. HUTCHINS. If nobody understands anything about the bill, I move that it be laid aside until somebody comes who does understand it.

Mr. HILL. I know what it is about, and wish to state to the House—[cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I move to concur in the Senate amendments. The amendments are unimportant.

The motion to concur was agreed to.

SARATOGA BATTLE MONUMENT.

The next bill on the Speaker's table with a Senate amendment was the bill (H. R. No. 4451) to provide for the erection of a monument at Schuylerville, New York, commemorative of the battle of Saratoga, and for other purposes.

The Senate amendment is as follows:

Add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

"Provided, That before transferring said money, or any part thereof, to the Saratoga Monument Association, it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall so certify, that a sum of money has been raised by said association which, together with the sum hereby appropriated, shall be sufficient to complete the monument in accordance with the design specified in this act."

Mr. STARIN. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. SPARKS. I think that amendment has never been considered by the House. My impression is that it ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. There is no point of order resting against this. The question is on the motion to concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STARIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VACATION OF AN ALLEY IN WASHINGTON.

The next bill on the Speaker's table with a Senate amendment was the bill (H. R. No. 5715) to vacate and close an alley in square 504, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Senate amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "directed," in line 2, down to and including line 5, and insert "sell and convey to the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company the ground occupied by the alley running north and south in square 504, between lots 8, 9, and 10, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, and to vacate and close up said alley: Provided, That said ground shall not be sold at a price below the average assessed value of the lands in said square: And provided further, That the commissioners aforesaid shall deposit in the Treasury of the United States, to the credit of the general fund of the District of Columbia, the purchase-money paid by said Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company."

Mr. HUNTON. I move concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CALIFORNIA INDIAN WAR BONDS.

The next bill on the Speaker's table with a Senate amendment was the bill (H. R. No. 1729) for the payment of certain Indian war bonds of the State of California.

The Senate amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of the unexpended balance of an appropriation of $924,259.65 made by the third section of the act of Congress approved August 5, 1854, the sum of $1,290.56, which last-named amount is hereby reappropriated, to the lawful holder of four California Indian war bonds issued by said State on the 18th day of May, 1856, under the provisions of the act of the Legislature thereof approved May 3, 1852, for the suppression of Indian hostilities therein, numbered respectively 164, 166, 167, and 168, each bond being for the sum of $250, and bearing interest from date of issue at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum; the amount herein appropriated being for the principal of said bonds, with interest thereon from date of issue until the 1st of July, 1860: Provided, That said bonds shall not be paid except out of any amount remaining unapplied of the original appropriation of $924,259.65 heretofore made."

Mr. DEERING. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. KELLEY from ten o'clock this evening.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 3292) granting a pension to Sally M. Buchanan, widow of General Robert C. Buchanan.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNOTT. Would it be in order for me at this time to move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. The House is acting now under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. KNOTT. I understand that. But I wish to know whether it would be in order for me at this time to move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It would not, because the House is now proceeding under a suspension of the rules for a particular object. That object is being now executed.

Mr. KNOTT. If I am recognized, my object is to call up Senate bill No. 1441.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recognize the gentleman at this time for the reason he has stated.

JOHANNA MEEHAN AND CHILDREN.

The next bill on the Speaker's table with Senate amendments was the bill (H. R. No. 2637) granting a pension and arrears of pension to Johanna Meehan and minor children.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Strike out, after the word "from," in line 10, "the 14th day of July, 1872, when said Patrick Meehan died," and insert "and after the passage of this act."

Amend the title, so as to read: "An act granting a pension to Johanna Meehan and minor children."

Mr. COLERICK. I move concurrence in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

TAXES ON CHURCH PROPERTY.

The next bill on the Speaker's table with a Senate amendment was the bill (H. R. No. 6324) to construe an act entitled "An act to relieve the churches in the District of Columbia, and to clear the title of the trustees of such property."

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That upon the payment, on or before the 1st day of October, 1881, of all taxes and assessments levied since the 1st day of July, 1874, upon church property used for parsonage purposes in the District of Columbia, all taxes and assessments levied upon said parsonage property prior to said 1st day of July, 1874, together with any and all penalties, costs, and interest that may have accrued thereon, shall be, and hereby are, remitted and released.

"SEC. 2. That all taxes and assessments heretofore levied upon orphan asylums and on the ground actually occupied thereby, together with all penalties, costs, and interest that may have accrued thereon, shall be, and hereby are, remitted and released; and said asylums and grounds shall hereafter be exempt from taxation while so occupied: Provided, That all other real estate belonging to such institutions shall still be held for assessment and taxation, and for all previous assessments and taxes.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I would like some gentleman who knows something about that bill to give an explanation. Meanwhile, I reserve points of order on it.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. The bill, as it passed the House originally, relieved parsonages and rectories from taxation. The Senate have added orphan asylums to the exemption.

Mr. MILLS. That is the only change?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Yes, sir. I move concurrence in the amendment of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN S. CORLETT.

The next bill on the Speaker's table with Senate amendments was the bill (H. R. No. 1102) granting a pension to John S. Corlett.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Strike out all after the words "pension-roll," in line 2, down to and including "1863," in line 3.

Strike out all after the word "private," in line 5, down to and including line 7, and insert the word "soldier."

Mr. CARPENTER. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CARPENTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPORT DUTIES AND INTERNAL-REVENUE TAXES.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 6568) to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce duties on imports and to reduce internal-revenue taxes, and for other purposes;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REDMOND TULLY.

The next bill on the Speaker's table with a Senate amendment was the bill (H. R. No. 2058) for the relief of Redmond Tully.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Redmond Tully, late first lieutenant of the Twelfth United States Infantry, as first lieutenant in the United States Infantry, to take effect from his nomination and confirmation under this act, and that he shall be assigned to the first vacancy occurring in such grade in the infantry arm of the service: Provided, That no pay or allowances on account of previous rank or services be allowed or paid to the said Tully: And provided further, That all laws prohibiting appointments in the Army in such cases be, and they are hereby, suspended so far, and so far only, as to the nomination of said Tully."

Mr. URNER. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McKENZIE. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Would it be in order for me to move to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of House bill No. 5084, providing for the construction of a public building at Owensborough, Kentucky?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the arrangement made by the House on the subject of public buildings. As soon as he can do so, he will recognize motions to take up bills for public buildings in the order in which they stand on the Calendar. The Chair cannot do that as yet, because he has promised to recognize the gentleman's colleague, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. THOMPSON,] after the present proceeding is completed.

JOHN H. TEMPLETON.

The next bill on the Speaker's table with a Senate amendment was the bill (H. R. No. 7160) for the relief of John H. Templeton.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the words "sum of," in line 3, down to and including line 9, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Four hundred and eighty-six dollars and sixty-four cents in his account with the Post-Office Department, being the value of postage-stamps stolen from his safe in the post-office in said town, by burglars, on the night of the 3d day of August, 1880."

Mr. STONE. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

SURETIES OF FRANKLIN TRAVIS.

The last bill on the Speaker's table with a Senate amendment was the bill (H. R. No. 688) for the relief of the sureties of Franklin Travis.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out the preamble.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was ageed to.

ANNA ELLA CARROLL.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7256) for the relief of Anna Ella Carroll; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS, BOUNTIES, AND BACK PAY.

Mr. COFFROTH. I am instructed unanimously by the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay to submit a report in writing to accompany the evidence taken by that committee; and I move that the report be printed with the evidence.

The motion was agreed to.

KENTUCKY WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I move to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4905) to declare the true intent and meaning of "an act to reimburse the State of Kentucky for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion," approved June 8, 1872, and to pass the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in adjusting the claim of the State of Kentucky the term "equipment" shall be construed to mean and include the arming of said forces, as an essential part of their equipments, and the word "supplying" shall include forage and fuel, and the transportation shall be embraced, as indicated in the title of the bill, it being the intention of Congress in the passage of said act to settle and adjust said accounts.

Mr. DUNNELL. Has that bill been reported from any committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that it is a unanimous report.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. It is the same bill which I showed the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WILLITS] when he objected to it.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I call for a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. McCOOK. Do I understand that this is a unanimous report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is so advised. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] can state to the House whether it was a unanimous report or not.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I understand it to be a unanimous report; I never heard any objection to it.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. TYLER,] a member of the Committee on War Claims, says it is the unanimous report of that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was so informed, and so stated to the House. After an inquiry was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCOOK] the Chair desired to have his statement confirmed by some member who is on the committee reporting the bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] calls for a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 123, noes 2.

No further count being called for, the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule there is now fifteen minutes on each side for debate.

Many MEMBERS. No! No! Vote! Vote!

Mr. WARNER. Let us have a brief explanation from the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will yield a moment to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WILLITS] to make a statement.

Mr. WILLITS. At the last session of Congress, when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] asked unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill, I objected to it. Subsequently I made some investigations at the Treasury Department, and the information I received from the Treasury officials satisfied me that the claim is just.

Several MEMBERS. That is enough.

The question was taken upon suspending the rules and passing the bill, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ROCHESTER, NEW YORK.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move to suspend the rules, so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the substitute for House bill No. 2531, for a public building at Rochester, New York, and to pass the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, at private sale or by condemnation, in pursuance of the statute of New York, a suitable lot of ground for a site for a building suitable for a post-office, court-house, custom-house, internal-revenue office, and other Government offices, in the city of Rochester, State of New York, and cause to be erected thereon a building suitable for the aforesaid purposes; and for the purposes herein mentioned the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The lot of land to be purchased, and the building hereby authorized to be constructed, when completed upon plans to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $300,000: Provided, That the site shall be of sufficient extent to leave an open space upon every side of the building to be erected, including streets and alleys, of at least fifty feet: Provided always, That the June term of the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of New York, now appointed to be held at Canandaigua, in said district, shall hereafter continue to be held in the court-rooms belonging to the United States in said village, as now provided by law, notwithstanding the erection of a public building in the city of Rochester as herein provided: And provided, That no money to be appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to said lot shall be vested in the United States.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. This bill is unanimously reported from the committee.

Mr. MILLS. There are a number of bills of that kind on the Calendar unanimously reported from the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is going by the Calendar, and is trying to do the best he can.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I protest that with fifty-odd bills of this kind on the Calendar——

The SPEAKER. There are fifty-five of them.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is not fair to take them up in their order on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. How would the gentleman have them taken up?

Mr. BLACKBURN. According to the list by which the Chair has always been guided for recognition of members to move a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The House determined that that list should not be conformed to, on a report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There is no report to that effect from the Committee on Rules, and no agreement of the House.

The SPEAKER. There was an agreement of the House that these bills for public buildings should be considered in their order on the Calendar.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I deny the accuracy of the Chair's recollection, and ask for the record.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suspend this class of business until the record can be found.

Mr. SCALES. I desire to say that I have been postponed for nearly twelve months, as I understand it, on that agreement.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the necessity of passing these bills at this hour of the session and sending them to the Senate, where they cannot be acted on?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will send for the record so as to find the agreement of which he has spoken. According to the recollection of the Chair, he was relieved from any choice, and these bills were to be taken up in their order on the Calendar.

Mr. SPARKS. It seems to me we ought first to act on Senate bills.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suspend all recognitions in reference to bills for public buildings until he can find the order agreed to by the House.

Mr. PAGE. I want to move to suspend the rules to pass a pension bill.

Mr. FERDON. I move to suspend the rules to take up Senate pension bills now upon the Speaker's table and the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERDON] moves to suspend the rules and take up all Senate pension bills——

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. All Senate bills.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman's motion is "Senate pension bills."

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will take their seats, and the House will come to order. The Chair will do nothing until order is restored.

Mr. WARNER. Would it be in order to move to take a recess?

The SPEAKER. It would be.

Mr. WARNER. I make the motion that the House take a recess until eight o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERDON] will repeat his motion.

Mr. FERDON. I move to suspend the rules so as to take up all Senate pension bills, first those upon the Speaker's table, then those upon the Calendar.

Mr. FINLEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is that motion open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WARNER. Under this motion would those bills be all taken up and passed by one vote?

The SPEAKER. Each bill would be acted upon separately.

Mr. PAGE. I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERDON] that the bills upon the Private Calendar have been considered by the House committee, and they ought to have preference over bills on the Speaker's table, which have not been considered by a House committee.

Mr. UPSON. I move that the House take a recess till eight o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules to consider Senate pension bills——

Mr. FERDON. First, those on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought the gentleman from New York had agreed to the suggestion of the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. PAGE. I move to amend the gentleman's motion.

The SPEAKER. It is not amendable.

Mr. FINLEY. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. MILLS. There is a motion pending to take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the motion for a recess.

The question being taken on the motion that the House take a recess till eight o'clock, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at eight o'clock p. m.) resumed its session.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. When the House took its recess the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERDON] was pending, which was a motion that the House suspend the rules to proceed to consider in their order Senate pension bills on the Speaker's table, and thereafter Senate pension bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I insist that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN VOORHIS,] who first rose and moved a suspension of the rules, is entitled to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois should have made the motion at the time. The motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERDON] was pending. As many as are in favor of suspending the rules for the purpose stated——

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have rights on this floor, and will be recognized to express what I think my duty as a Representative requires of me. I say that the Speaker himself laid down a rule——

The SPEAKER. Yes; and the Speaker is going to adhere to it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Very well; when the Speaker adheres to it then he will recognize the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN VOORHIS,] as he ought to do.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Mr. Speaker, a single word. I understood the Speaker to ask a suspension of action on my motion until the record could be produced. I have the record.

The SPEAKER. Whenever the Chair has the opportunity to recognize gentlemen desiring the passage of bills for public buildings they will be recognized.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker, aside from any feeling—and I am very sorry indeed that I permitted a little feeling to overcome me—I desire to say this: the Speaker will remember that a year ago when I rose and was recognized by the Speaker, and called up a bill of this kind, the Speaker informed me that the rule——

The SPEAKER. The Speaker adheres to every word he has ever uttered.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Then out of deference to the Speaker's request, I withdrew the bill and took my seat.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I claim the right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman whenever he has the opportunity. As many as are in favor of the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERDON] to suspend the rules to consider in their order Senate pension bills on the Speaker's table, and thereafter Senate pension bills on the Private Calendar, will say "ay."

Mr. FERDON, Mr. SINGLETON of Illinois, and others, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRIGHT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRIGHT. Would it be in order to move to amend the motion of the gentleman from New York?

The SPEAKER. It would not as it is a motion to suspend the rules.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 688) for the relief of the sureties of Franklin Travis;

A bill (H. R. No. 1102) granting a pension to John S. Corlett;

A bill (H. R. No. 1729) for the payment of certain Indian war bonds of the State of California;

A bill (H. R. No. 2058) for the relief of Redmond Tully;

A bill (H. R. No. 2384) amendatory of and supplementary to "An act to provide for the holding of terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Fort Wayne, Indiana," approved June 18, 1878;

A bill (H. R. No. 2637) granting a pension to Johanna Meehan and minor children;

A bill (H. R. No. 3132) to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 3520) to establish a port of delivery at Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana;

A bill (H. R. No. 4451) to provide for the erection of a monument at Schuylerville, New York, commemorative of the battle of Saratoga, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 5715) to vacate and close an alley in square 504 in Washington, District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 6324) to construe an act entitled "An act to relieve the churches and orphan asylums of the District of Columbia, and to clear the title of the trustees of such property;" and

A bill (H. R. No. 7160) for the relief of John H. Templeton.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GUNTER. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is a motion to suspend the rules and take up Senate pension bills.

Mr. GUNTER. I did not so understand the motion, nor did others on this side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his motion again.

Mr. GUNTER. I understood the gentleman's motion was to consider Senate bills on the Speaker's table, and after that pension bills on the Private Calendar. That was the motion we understood to be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will state his motion again.

Mr. FERDON. My motion is that we suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table all pension bills which have passed the Senate; and thereafter Senate pension bills upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. GUNTER. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. HUNTON. When we go to the Private Calendar can we take up any other Senate bills than those for pensions?

The SPEAKER. Not under the motion.

Mr. FERDON. My motion has reference only to Senate bills.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Make your motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table and you will carry it.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 41, not voting 140; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof.

During the roll-call,

Mr. HOOKER said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. There is some difference of opinion as to what is the actual purport of the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated it several times. That is not a point of order.

Mr. HOOKER. It is a point of order, because I understand from the gentleman from New York his motion is confined to bills on the Speaker's table.

Mr. PAGE. To Senate pension bills on the Speaker's table and on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. FERDON. I have stated over and over again that my motion refers simply to Senate pension bills on the Speaker's table and to the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOOKER. I want to read Rule XVI, so all doubt may be removed. It requires every motion made to the House and entertained by the Speaker shall be reduced to writing on the demand of any member. Now, what is the purport of the gentleman's motion as reduced to writing?

The SPEAKER. It is too late; the rules have been suspended and the motion adopted.

The following pairs were announced:
Mr. SAMFORD with Mr. RYAN of Kansas.
Mr. CLEMENTS with Mr. HOUK.
Mr. CLARDY with Mr. FORD, for this evening.
Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. ROBESON. Mr. BLACKBURN would have voted "nay" and Mr. ROBESON "yea."
Mr. STARIN with Mr. RICHARDSON of South Carolina, for the remainder of the legislative day or until both are present.
Mr. BLAND with Mr. DAVIS of California, on all political questions, for the remainder of this day.
Mr. JOYCE with Mr. BUCKNER, for the remainder of the session.
Mr. O'NEILL with Mr. KNOTT, on the Eaton tariff bill and political questions.
Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky, with Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, on all questions until ten o'clock to-night, except to make a quorum.
Mr. BELTZHOOVER with Mr. BAYNE, on this vote.
Mr. WILLIS with Mr. NICHOLLS, on this vote.
Mr. BOUCK with Mr. MCKINLEY.
The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.
Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I move the House do now adjourn.
Mr. HOOKER. On that I demand the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were not ordered.
Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.
Tellers were refused, twenty-three members only voting therefor.
So the House refused to adjourn. [Cries of "Regular order!"]
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the first bill on the Calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury, in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes; in which amendments concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.
The message also announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 2165) to amend section 2297 of title 32 of the Revised Statutes, relating to homestead settlers, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Messrs. BOOTH, WALKER, and PLUMB as managers on the part of the Senate in said conference.
The message further announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution providing that the Joint Select Committee on additional accommodations for the Library of Congress be continued and authorized to sit during the coming recess of Congress; in which concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the first bill on the Speaker's table, in pursuance of the action of the House just taken.
The Clerk read as follows:
A bill (S. No. 365) for the relief of Hardie Hogan Helper.
The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.
Mr. COFFROTH. I move to suspend the reading of these bills and pass them by their title.
Several members objected.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MCMAHON. I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury, in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes, and move to non-concur in the Senate amendments and ask a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.
The motion was agreed to.
Some time subsequently the Speaker appointed Mr. MCMAHON, Mr. HISCOCK, and Mr. COBB as the conferees on the part of the House on the said bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed to read the first bill upon the Calendar.
Mr. HOOKER. I demand the reading of the bill, and also the report.
Mr. COFFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I have made a motion to pass these bills by their title, and save time consumed in reading.
Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. My point of order is that every member has a right to demand the reading of a bill on which he is required to vote.
Mr. HOOKER. I have demanded the reading of the bill, and also the reading of the report accompanying it.
Mr. KNOTT. I wish to ask what is before House.
The SPEAKER. A pension bill from the Senate, now on the Speaker's table.
Mr. KNOTT. What was the object of the vote just taken?
The SPEAKER. To suspend the rules.
Mr. KNOTT. Have the rules been suspended?
The SPEAKER. The rules have been suspended.
Mr. KNOTT. What is the object of suspending the rules? Was it to take up and pass these bills?
The SPEAKER. That is the order of the House.
Mr. KNOTT. I ask if it requires a motion to suspend the rules in each case to pass a bill?
The SPEAKER. It does not. The motion was to suspend the rules and proceed to the consideration of this business. A majority vote will pass a bill under this order.
Mr. KNOTT. It does not require a two-thirds vote?
The SPEAKER. It does not.
Mr. KNOTT. Then the rules have been suspended for what purpose?
The SPEAKER. The motion was to suspend the rules and proceed to the consideration of pension bills from the Senate upon the Speaker's table, and then proceed to consider pension bills from the Senate upon the Calendar. That motion has been agreed to by a vote of 109 to 41, more than two-thirds.
Mr. KNOTT. The motion was to take up pension bills from the Speaker's table; for what purpose?
The SPEAKER. For consideration and action upon them by the House. The first bill will be read.

HARDIE HOGAN HELPER.

The bill was read a first and second time. It is as follows:
Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Hardie Hogan Helper, who was disabled while on special duty under the command of General A. E. Burnside, in the war of the late rebellion, and pay him a pension at the rate of $10 per month from the passage of this act.
Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate bill be passed, and that the Senate bills taken from the Speaker's table be read merely by their titles.
The SPEAKER. Any member has the right to call for the reading in full of every bill.
Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Cannot the rule be suspended under which that right exists?
The SPEAKER. The House is operating now under a suspension of the rules, and while that is the case another motion to suspend the rules would not be in order.
Mr. WARNER. I demand the regular order.
Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. The rules have been suspended for the purpose of taking up these bills for consideration. Now, is not a two-thirds vote necessary to pass a bill?
The SPEAKER. It is not. [Cries of "Regular order!"]
Mr. HOOKER. I call for the reading of the report on the pending bill.
The SPEAKER. The report is not at the desk. It has been sent for.
Mr. FRYE. When the rules are suspended touching the enactment of legislation, is not that rule suspended which requires the reading on the demand of any memher?
The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The order made under a suspension of the rules was to proceed to the consideration of these bills. The Chair is informed there is no report. The papers in the case have been transmitted by the Senate.
The question was on ordering the bill to be read a third time.
The question was taken, and there were—ayes 109, noes 2.
Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. No quorum.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SINGLETON, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. FERDON.
The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 126, noes none.
Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. No quorum.
Mr. HOOKER. I move a call of the House.
Mr. COFFROTH. I demand the yeas and nays.
Mr. WILSON. I rise to a privileged question.
Mr. HOOKER. I demand the regular order.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will not permit the regular order to be interrupted. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COFFROTH] demands the yeas and nays.
Mr. HOOKER. When the House divided on the question of the third reading of the bill no quorum voted. Only two motions were then in order, the motion for a call of the House and a motion to adjourn. I moved that there be a call of the House.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COFFROTH] demanded the yeas und nays.
Mr. HOOKER. I moved a call of the House before that demand was made.
The SPEAKER. A further count may show a quorum.
Mr. HOOKER. It may be so; but I moved a call of the House, and no motion was in order but a motion to adjourn or a motion for a call of the House. I ask the ruling of the Chair on that point.
The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The House has the right by a further proceeding to find out whether there be a quorum present.

Mr. HOOKER. An actual count has shown there is no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The tellers' count did not show a quorum; but the House may desire a yea-and-nay vote, and the yeas and nays have been demanded to ascertain if there is a quorum. When a count by tellers does not show a quorum it is in order for the House further to test the fact by a yea-and-nay vote. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOOKER. Do I understand the Speaker rules the demand for the yeas and nays is proper?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that the House has a right to exhaust all its power under its rules and under the Constitution to find out whether there is a quorum.

Mr. HOOKER. But, as I understand it, the yeas and nays are ordered on a motion pending, and not on a question whether there is a quorum or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOOKER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BROWNE. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. HOOKER. And upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 17; not a sufficient number.

Mr. HOOKER. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering tellers there were ayes 16; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers on the yeas and nays were refused and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. McKENZIE. I demand a division on the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

The House divided; and there were ayes 135, noes none.

Mr. HOOKER. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. COFFROTH. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been refused. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. McKENZIE, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BROWNE.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 140, noes 6.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes "ay." The "ayes" have it, and the appeal is laid on the table.

Mr. HOOKER. Did a quorum vote?

The SPEAKER. A quorum has voted without the Chair; but, that there may be no controversy, the Chair has voted. There are two vacancies and 146 is a majority of the House.

Mr. HOOKER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on a viva voce vote, the Speaker stated that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. HOOKER. I call for a division.

Mr. PRICE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRICE. During a motion to suspend the rules but one motion to adjourn is in order.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the rules have been suspended and we are now operating under a suspension. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 4, noes 105.

Mr. HOOKER. I demand tellers on the motion to adjourn.

On the question of ordering tellers, there were ayes 15; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were not ordered; and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOOKER. I have a proposition to make to the other side.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. HOOKER. I propose that we shall devote one hour to the consideration of pension bills and one hour to the consideration of other bills. [Renewed cries of "Regular order!"] I am perfectly willing to consider all the pension bills on the Speaker's table, but I am not willing to consider Senate bills now on the Calendar of the House, to the exclusion of all other business. [Continued cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for, which is on ordering the Senate bill now before the House to a third reading, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 170, nays 18, not voting 102; as follows:

So the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. McKENZIE with Mr. DAVIDSON, on this vote.

Mr. HISCOCK with Mr. COBB, both being absent by order of the House on a conference committee.

Mr. EVINS with Mr. CALDWELL of Kentucky, on this vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The bill was read the third time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 853) granting a pension to Caroline Stief;

A bill (H. R. No. 1453) for the relief of James R. Gordon;

A bill (H. R. No. 1649) granting a pension to William W. Church;

A bill (H. R. No. 2180) granting an increase of pension to James H. Reeve;

A bill (H. R. No. 3786) granting a pension to William C. Parker;

A bill (H. R. No. 4608) granting a pension to Betsey Elwell; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5677) granting a pension to Stephen P. Benton.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes, and agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes thereon, and had appointed Mr. WALLACE, Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, and Mr. BOOTH the conferees on the part of the Senate.

H. H. HELPER.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the passage of Senate bill No. 365, for the relief of Hardie Hogan Helper.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to submit a proposition to this House which I think will facilitate the transaction of public business here to-night.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. BELFORD. You may call the regular order, but unless some accommodation is reached there will be very little legislation done here to-night. And in the interest of public business I desire to submit a proposition. [Renewed cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HOOKER. I hope order will be preserved so that we may hear the proposition of the gentleman.

Mr. BELFORD. I propose that we devote one hour to the consideration of these pension bills, and at the expiration of that hour that one hour be devoted to the consideration of other measures pending in this House. We who represent the great West——

A MEMBER. Have you a bill on the Speaker's table?

Mr. BELFORD. I have no bill on the Speaker's table; but I have one to which no man in this House objects, [laughter,] and I propose to insist upon its consideration. It is a just and meritorious bill.

The SPEAKER. What is the proposition of the gentleman?

Mr. BELFORD. It is a bill for a public building at the capital of my State. [Laughter.] We are perfectly willing to allow you to pass these pension bills during the next hour without any opposition, provided that you will afford to us then a right to be recognized on the floor of this House to bring forward legislation in which our constituents are deeply interested.

The SPEAKER. What is the proposition of the gentleman?

Mr. KEIFER. It is to devote an hour to pension bills, and then an hour to something else.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the proposition to the House.

Mr. BELFORD. My proposition is that we devote an hour from this time to the consideration of these pension bills; that then we devote an hour to the consideration of other bills; then if all the pension bills be not passed that we devote another hour to the consideration of pension bills. This proposition is fair and just, and I ask that it be adopted in the interest of the transaction of the public business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOOKER. On this side, I for one accept the proposition of the gentleman, believing it to be made in good faith, that after one hour devoted to pension bills members be accorded the floor to exercise the right, which the rules give us during the last six days of the session, to move to suspend the rules.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The question before the House is on the passage of this bill.

The bill was passed.

MARY A. SHEMELIA.

The next Senate pension bill upon the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 182) granting a pension to Mary A. Shemelia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place, or cause to be placed, upon the pension-rolls of the United States the name of Mary A. Shemelia, as dependent widowed mother of William H. Shemelia, deceased, late a member of Company C of the Thirty-fourth Regiment of New Jersey Volunteers, who died at post hospital at Paducah, in the State of Kentucky, December 14, A. D. 1864, at the full rate of pension allowed by the pension laws to dependent widowed mothers of enlisted soldiers, to commence from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. CLYMER. I call for the reading of the report, if there is one, in this case.

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 182) granting a pension to Mary A. Shemelia, have carefully examined the same, and report:

That Mary A. Shemelia was the mother of William H. Shemelia, who was a private in Company C, Thirty-fourth New Jersey Volunteers, and who died while in the service, in the post-hospital, December 11, 1864, of "typho-pneumonia," contracted in the line of his duty.

The evidence submitted shows that prior to enlistment and during his term of service the petitioner's son contributed to her support, and that she is now a widow and living in abject poverty.

Your committee therefore report back the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

The question being on ordering the bill to a third reading,

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 174, nays 8, not voting 108; as follows:

So the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. CHITTENDEN with Mr. NICHOLLS, on all questions, until the regular session to-morrow morning.

Mr. MONEY with Mr. STONE, for the remainder of to-night's session.

Mr. KENNA with Mr. WARD; Mr. KENNA being absent on duty upon the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. KENNA,] but as he would have voted "ay" on this question, I have also voted "ay."

The bill was read a third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 16, noes 90; less than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. HOOKER. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 99, noes 5; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHITE and Mr. HOOKER were appointed.

Mr. WHITE. I have a proposition to submit to the House. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WHITE. Will the Chair hear me?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to hear the gentleman; the House will not permit the Chair to do so.

Mr. WHITE. I ask unanimous consent. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 144, noes 3.

So the bill was passed.

GEORGE SMITH.

The next Senate pension bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 465) granting an increase of pension to George Smith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George Smith, of Culpeper County, Virginia, late private in Captain Charles C. Allen's Company of Virginia Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $15 per month, that being the amount to which his disability entitles him according to the report of the board of examining surgeons.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the report.

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 465) granting an increase of pension to George Smith, have examined the same, and report:

That the claimant, while unable to furnish the testimony of an eye-witness to the accident whereby he received the injury for which he claims the pension, does, in the opinion of the committee, furnish abundant proofs that he did receive it as he alleges, and they therefore recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I do think that this is a case which ought not to receive the approval of this House. The report just read states there is no witness to prove the injury for which the pension is claimed. The fact that the man was wounded in the service cannot be proved, yet the committee say that he ought to have a pension. I think the report is sufficient to show that the bill should not pass.

Mr. HUNTON. If my friend will allow me, I beg leave to say just a word. This man had his hip dislocated in the war of 1812, and has been walking on a crutch ever since. He is now over eighty years of age.

Mr. CONGER. There is no objection to the bill.

Mr. HUNTON. The Senate committee reported it back favorably. I hope it will be passed.

Mr. BROWNE. There is no objection on this side.

Mr. HUNTON. My friend from Illinois takes back all he said.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Yes; I demand the yeas and nays.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 137) to create a commission for the performance of certain duties under the act of Congress providing for the erection of a monument at Yorktown and the proposed centennial celebration; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced the adoption of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

It further announced the passage without amendment of a bill (H. R. No. 1830) granting a pension to Peter Grattan, and a bill (H. R. No. 7111) restoring the name of Andrew J. Pennel to the pension-roll.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise for the purpose of submitting a conference report, and the statement required by the rules of the House to accompany it. That statement fully explains what has been agreed to by the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 7203, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 17, 19, 22, 32, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 44, 45, 53, 57, 59, 61, 64, 69, 75, 77, 79, 80, 81, 83, 86, 94, and 108.

Mr. WARNER. I demand those amendments be read.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman from Ohio will only wait a moment he will find the accompanying statement specifies exactly what those amendments are. It will save a good deal of time. [Cries of "Read!" "Read!"]

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the report, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 18, 20, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28, 30, 31, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 43, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 54, 55, 56, 58, 60, 62, 63, 65, 66, 67, 68, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 76, 78, 82, 83½, 84, 85, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 107, 109, and 110; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "325,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out "60" and insert in lieu thereof "25;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out from the matter proposed to be inserted the word "thirteen" and insert in lieu thereof "seven;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out "75" and insert in lieu thereof "50;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out "300" and insert in lieu thereof "250;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 95, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out "81" and insert in lieu thereof "82;" and the Senate agree to the same.

As to the Senate amendment numbered 106 the committee are unable to agree.

JAMES H. BLUONT,
J. A. McMAHON,
JAMES MONROE,
Managers on the part of the House.
JAMES B. BECK,
H. G. DAVIS,
WILLIAM WINDOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The statement accompanying the conference report will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the sundry civil appropriation bill submit the following detailed statement in explanation of the conference report submitted.

The effect of the action recommended on the Senate amendments will be, if ratified by the two Houses, as follows:

On amendment 1, appropriates $100,000 to complete barge-office building in New York.

On amendment 2, strikes out $30,000 for additions and repairs to assay-office building in New York.

On amendment 3, in reference to the public building in Philadelphia, strikes out the following, which was inserted by the House:

"And be it further provided, That there be expended out of the amount herein appropriated a sum sufficient for the completion and fitting up of as many of the rooms of said building as will accommodate the post-office of said city."

On amendment 4, provides for iron-framed and fire-proof roof on public building at Topeka, Kansas, and extends cost of said building $20,000.

On amendment 5, extends limit of cost of public building at Toledo, Ohio, to $400,000, and authorizes Secretary of the Treasury to sell the property now situated on the site of said building.

On amendment 6, is verbal.

On amendment 7, provides $40,000 for a light-station at Point Conception, California.

On amendments 88 and 89, verbal to perfect clause.

On amendment 90, provides $5,000 to publish first volume of the report of the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard in 1874.

On amendments 91, 92, and 93, provides that the commissioners to attend the international monetary conference shall be appointed by the President by and with the consent of the Senate, and provides for one secretary to said commissioners at $3,000.

On amendment 94, strikes out provision for an embassy to Mexico.

On amendment 96, provides $50,000 for expenses of French and American claims commission.

On amendments 97 and 98, inserts the following:

"To enable the President to execute the provisions of section 1753 of the Revised Statutes, for the promotion of efficiency in the different branches of the civil service, $15,000.

"For printing and distributing monthly the publications by the Department of State of the consular and other commercial reports, including circular letters to chambers of commerce, $10,000."

On amendments 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, and 105, relate to compensation of officers and employés and expenses of the Senate.

On amendment 104, provides an extra month's pay for the session employés of the House and Senate.

On amendments 107 and 108, makes a verbal correction and restores appropriations for certain contested-election expenses of the House proposed to be stricken out.

On amendment 109, inserts the following:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds: Provided, That the bonds so purchased or redeemed shall constitute no part of the sinking fund, but shall be canceled."

On amendment 110, inserts the following:

"SEC. 3. Section 1 of 'an act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for deficiencies and for other purposes;' approved February 26, 1881, is hereby amended by striking out the words 'including arrears to' where they occur in the second paragraph of the section, and the words 'including arrears' in the seventh paragraph of said section."

On amendment 106, leaves clause as amended by the Senate and disagreed to by the House for submission to the House.

JAMES H. BLOUNT,
JOHN A. McMAHON,
JAMES MONROE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Pending the reading of the above report—

Mr. WARNER. I understand this amendment No. 24 to be agreed to. If agreed to it will stand as there read?

Mr. BLOUNT. It will.

Mr. WARNER. In reference to the fifty-fifth amendment read by the Clerk is that retained or stricken out?

Mr. BLOUNT. It is inserted.

Mr. WARNER. Then amendment 56; do I understand that is retained or stricken out?

Mr. BLOUNT. That is agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATKINS. I submit it is not competent to interrupt the reading of the detailed statement.

The SPEAKER. The report will be gone through with.

Mr. WARNER. Is it not competent to know, as we go through with it, what is done with these various amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the statement had better be read, and then questions may be asked in reference to any special amendment.

Mr. WARNER. Very well, then.

The Clerk completed the reading of the report.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, in addition to the statement there I desire to add that the total amount added to the bill as reported to the Senate is $2,069,894.51. The Senate struck off a few items, leaving it still above two million dollars.

The conferees on the part of the Senate have yielded in round numbers $1,200,000; and the House have yielded in round numbers $869,000. The law as agreed to, for the current fiscal year, amounted to $22,523,821.60. The bill as agreed to by the committee of conference of the two Houses amounts to $21,513,447.42, leaving a decrease or diminution in the amount of the bill over the next fiscal year of over one million ten thousand three hundred and seventy-four dollars and eighteen cents.

But it is to be borne in mind that the census appropriations for this fiscal year were about three million dollars, whereas during the fiscal year 1882 it is but $625,000; so that really on the current expenditures for the two years there is substantially an increase in the bill.

The House and Senate conferees, as will be seen by the report, have agreed upon every matter of difference in the bill except on the amendment numbered 106, on page 69 of the sundry civil bill as amended by the Senate. That amendment reads as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to the officers and employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual roll on the 1st day of July 1880, one month's extra pay at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available.

The Senate conferees claim that this was without precedent.

Mr. CONGER. What is the number of that amendment?

Mr. BLOUNT. Number 106. The Senate conferees claim that this, as I have said, is without precedent. That it had been usual to pay committee clerks, pages, and other employés of the Senate, who were not receiving annual salaries, an extra month's pay, but that never, except in a single instance, had there been payment of an extra month's pay to the annual employés; and that was two years ago, where there had been discontent between the two Houses as to the relative pay of the employés. At that time the House passed a resolution giving an extra month's pay to the annual employés of the House, and in that single instance, and in that one only, the Senate agreed to the resolution.

The Senate conferees announced most positively to the conferees on the part of the House that they cannot consent to this proposition. They thought it was wrong, but that if the House should insist upon it, they would feel it to be their duty to add the Senate employés to this item.

This proposition to pay the House employés was inserted on the idea of equalizing to some extent the salaries of the House and Senate employés; and that being so, we could not consent to a failure of that purpose by inserting the Senate employés as well as the House employés in the bill, thereby keeping up the very inequalities of which the House was complaining. There was but little time to adjust this matter, and we felt it our duty before yielding anything to bring this question back to the House for instructions.

I now ask, Mr Speaker, the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will yield to the gentleman if he wishes to be heard.

Mr. HAWLEY. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there must be some way of expressing a difference on the part of the House with the conclusions reached by the conference committee. There are several points on which a difference of opinion may exist, but one specially I will refer to as an example. I allude to the sixty-fourth amendment, on page 44 of the bill, in the following words:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to immediately charter or purchase, equip, and supply a vessel for the prosecution of a search for the steamer Jeannette of the arctic exploring expedition, (which the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to undertake,) and such other vessels as may be found to need assistance during said cruise, $175,000: Provided, That said vessel shall be wholly manned by volunteers from the Navy.

I understand the report to say that this is to be stricken out.

If it be in order, I wish to say a word or two about that as briefly as it may be. I think there is a great mistake in striking out that provision.

Two years ago, Mr. Speaker, a wealthy and enterprising citizen of the United States, who had previously distinguished himself by his enterprise, put at the service of the Government, or at the service of science, if you please, a vessel of his own, a most excellent ship. The United States accepted and equipped that vessel. There are three commissioned officers of our Navy upon that ship. It is provided with a crew of our own good sailors. Two years ago that vessel started out through Behring's Strait on an exploring expedition in the interest of geographical knowledge, and also at the behest of charity, for the relief of two whaling-ships which had started out from New Bedford and had never been heard of. That ship, the Jeannette, the gift of this large-hearted citizen of the United States, went on that expedition of charity, and, as Divine Providence would have it, the Jeannette is missing, too.

We are not justified in saying those people are all dead. It is only two years ago they went there. They were abundantly equipped. They may have reached Wrangel Land and erected huts and be living there. And if they have nothing but their rifles and a good supply of ammunition they can live on the seals for years. There is on record here the experience of a Connecticut sailor, who, with eighteen persons, Esquimaux and others, passed six months floating on a field of ice coming down Baffin's Bay, a distance of 1,600 miles, and the entire party came out in good health.

Now, there are three vessels there; two owned by private parties, one owned by a private party but adopted, indorsed, taken up by and sent into the field by the United States Government with three gallant officers and a gallant crew. They have not been heard from for a time. Whether the original sending out of the Jeannette was wise or not, I do not discuss to-night. Whether it be well for the Government to enter into a partnership with private citizens in a matter of that sort, is nothing to us in this connection. We did it. We accepted that vessel. We put our people on it. They are our commissioned officers, our children in a certain sense as well as our gallant defenders. They may be—I hope we may reasonably believe they are—alive somewhere there now, looking and waiting and hoping, as they have a right to hope, we are a nation of gentlemen. And under these circumstances this House—I do not care what may be the motive, if it be economy I am ashamed of it—strikes out the appropriation of $175,000 to send a vessel there to hunt them up. We ought to be equipping it with double haste. That vessel ought to have sailed before this. It ought to go up to Behring Straits, and go just as far into that great arctic drift as it dare go; and they could put up huts, with provisions, on Wrangel Land and the main land to the southward of it, and prosecute this search as much as they can do without running the risk of losing another vessel.

I do not know how this House can agree to desert the men that went there on a message of charity, and from a false—I would say if permitted to do so, a shameful—idea of economy say, "Oh, we want to keep this sundry civil bill as low as we can."

I want to disagree with the action of the conference committee. I cannot, perhaps, precisely word the parliamentary motion; but I would move, if that be the way, to instruct the conference committee to restore that appropriation. [Applause.]

Mr. BLOUNT. After a word or two I shall ask the previous question on the conference report.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope not. There are other points that ought to be noticed besides that of which I have spoken.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia if he does not propose to allow discussion on the question as to the payment of the House employés?

Mr. BLOUNT. I propose to do that; but I desire to move the previous question on the adoption of the report so far as the conferees on the part of the two Houses have agreed.

Mr. ATKINS. Will my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Georgia, allow me to ask him a question, that the House may understand distinctly the effect of the report? As I understand, the conference committee have agreed on every amendment except two, those numbered 106 and 108.

Mr. BLOUNT. The only amendment on which the conference committee has failed to agree is number 106, in relation to the extra pay of the House employés.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. If the previous question is demanded and sustained by the House, can we have a separate vote on the proposition to disagree to amendment numbered 64, in relation to the search for the steamer Jeannette?

The SPEAKER. The only way to reach that would be to vote down the report.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope I am not losing my place. I wish to move to disagree and instruct the committee of conference to restore amendment numbered 64.

The SPEAKER. A conference report has to be agreed to or disagreed to as an entirety.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope the House will disagree. Is it not competent for the House to instruct the committee on a given point?

Mr. BAKER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAKER. If the House should disagree to the report of the conference committee, would it then be competent for the House to instruct the conferees to agree to this item or attempt to insert it? Would not that be competent?

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Speaker, is it not competent——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey will allow the Chair to answer one question before he submits another. In reply to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER,] the Chair will state that the practice of the House in most cases has been to recognize the fact that a conference had to be a free and full conference without instructions; and yet there have been exceptions to that rule, and the House has expressed its opinion, not, perhaps, in the form of instructions, but its opinion upon particular items. The Chair thinks there was a case in the Forty-fifth Congress where that was done on the legislative appropriation bill. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] will now propound his question and the Chair will endeavor to answer it.

Mr. ROBESON. I am answered.

Mr. BAKER. I wish to ask the gentleman who makes the report from the committee on conference a question in reference to an item contained in that report which I do not understand. I observe the sum $250,000 is appropriated for the construction of a building to accommodate the Bureau of Pensions. The question that I want to ask is, whether or not this sum of $250,000 is appropriated simply for the purpose of purchasing a site, or whether it is intended with that amount of money to procure a site and also to erect a building, and if it is not intended to complete the building how much is the limit, if any, fixed for the cost of the building?

Mr. BLOUNT. The $250,000 relates alone to the site for the building. There is no proposition for a building other than that contained in the purchase of a site. The building is to be a matter for future consideration.

Mr. BAKER. I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD as a portion of the debates a table which I have had prepared touching receipts and expenditures of a general nature of the Post-Office Department.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Postal receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, in States comprising the electoral college, (excluding the District of Columbia and the Territories, and also receipts and expenditures of a general nature not due or chargeable to any particular State or Territory.)

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to that part of the report relating to the amendment of the Senate in regard to which the committee of conference was unable to agree. And I wish to know of the gentleman, or rather of the Chair, whether after the previous question has been ordered on this report it will be time for the House to consider a resolution instructing their conferees on the subject of that disagreement in relation to the payment of one month's extra pay to the employés of the House?

The SPEAKER. This is a partial report from the committee of conference, and the Chair is advised that there is but one subject of disagreement between the two Houses. Immediately after the adoption of this report, if it shall be adopted, the Chair would recognize a motion for the House to insist upon its disagreement and ask a further conference, or to recede from its disagreement.

Mr. KEIFER. Then at that time I desire to be recognized for the purpose of offering a resolution instructing the conferees of the House to insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate striking out that provision.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Georgia allows me to make one remark in reference to Senate amendment No. 64. There is now pending before this House a bill for the relief of the steamer Jeannette. That bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations, and if the House desires it, it is perfectly competent for the House to pass that bill.

While I do not express any opinion one way or the other as to the propriety of the passage of that bill at this time, I beg to say that I hope this House will not concur with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and instruct its conferees upon this subject. The hours of the session are growing very few, and it is high time that this bill be passed if it is to become a law. I trust the Committee on Enrolled Bills will have time to read over this bill and compare it. It will take hours to read it, and if this bill is to go back to the committee of conference, upon the point which the gentleman from Connecticut asks, it may be too late to pass this bill.

If a majority of this House desires to pass an appropriation of $175,000 for the relief of the Jeannette, let it do it upon its own merits and not tack it on this bill to be dragged through by the momentum of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CRAPO.]

Mr. CRAPO. I wish to say a word in answer to what has been said by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.] A bill for the relief of the Jeannette, appropriating a hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars to equip a vessel to be sent to the Arctic region, was passed by the Senate and sent to the House. That bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to report the same back to the House within a week. That bill has not yet been reported back from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ATKINS. Which bill?

Mr. CRAPO. The bill from the Senate for the relief of the Jeannette, which was referred by this House to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ATKINS. A House bill in the very language of the Senate bill was reported from that committee.

Mr. CRAPO. The House gave instructions to the committee to report that very Senate bill back to the House within a week.

Mr. ATKINS. Not instructions to report it back.

Mr. CRAPO. That is the record in the Journal; and I refer to the Journal.

Mr. ATKINS. I read the Journal differently.

Mr. CRAPO. Let the Journal be read.

Mr. BLOUNT. If that is so, we can very easily dispose of it.

Mr. ROBESON. Was not that a substantial instruction from this House to the committee to put it in this bill?

Mr. CRAPO. If there is any doubt about it, as a matter of fact, I ask that the Journal be read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have yielded now all the time I can on this report.

Mr. CRAPO. One word further.

Mr. MILLS. I remember that I made a point of order against the bill, and I do not see how it could have got to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CRAPO. That is the record in the Journal; I have examined it.

Mr. MILLS. I made the point of order that the Senate could not originate an appropriation bill.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. And I remember that the next morning, upon my motion, that bill was sent to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to report it back to the House within one week.

Mr. MILLS. How did it get there?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It went there by order of the House.

Mr. CRAPO. Now, Mr. Speaker, if any effective aid is to be furnished to the Jeannette, we must at once put in operation the necessary means to supply it. There is among arctic navigators a difference of opinion as to the condition of that vessel. For myself—and I have given considerable attention to the question—I believe that she is now in safety; but her danger is yet to come. The Jeannette was last seen in September, 1879. She was then drifting in the ice to the north. I believe after that she made an anchorage on Wrangel Land; and the next season, the summer of 1880, she pursued her way northward toward the pole. She was amply equipped for two arctic winters. Her great danger is the breaking up of the ice in the coming summer, when it will be absolutely necessary for her to make her way southward.

Now, it may be that her crew have been reduced by death or enfeebled by disease, or that her machinery may have been crippled, or the vessel herself somewhat injured; and if succor should be sent to her in season, those brave men may be saved; and if they are saved they will bring back to us some account of the mysteries of those ice-blocked regions.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] for a single question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. My question is this: Even if this conference report be adopted, does not the bill have to go back to the conference committee; and if it is to go back, can we not instruct the House conferees to agree to the Senate amendment touching the Jeannette?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not yield for that question.

Mr. ROBESON. It is perfectly competent to instruct the conference committee to agree to this amendment.

The SPEAKER. This conference report must be accepted or rejected as a whole. The only way for the House to reach the Jeannette appropriation is to vote down this conference report, and thereafter instruct the committee of conference touching it as well as the other matter in disagreement.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Chair answer this one question?

The SPEAKER. Certainly, if he can.

Mr. CONGER. If the House should concur in this conference report will not the bill still have to go back to the conference committee?

The SPEAKER. Only one item.

Mr. CONGER. Well, it leaves one item; so that there must be a meeting of the conference committee.

The SPEAKER. There must be another meeting of the conference committee, but only on that one amendment.

Mr. FORT. Would it not be easier to pass the Senate bill, which we have now on our table, than to disagree to the report for the sake of getting at the Jeannette appropriation?

The SPEAKER. The point of order will be made against the Senate bill, that the Senate had no right to originate it.

Mr. ROBESON. The easiest and quickest way is to vote down this report and instruct the House conferees to agree to that amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have only a few words to say, and then I shall ask the previous question.

We are getting very near to the end of this session; we have very little time for deliberation. It is alleged that as a matter of humanity we should vote this sum of money for the purpose designated in the amendment. I desire to call the attention of the House for a moment to the methods that have been adopted in reference to these scientific expeditions. We agreed to allow certain naval officers to go to the relief of the arctic exploring party, upon the understanding that a certain vessel, the Gulnare, was to be furnished for the purpose. On the understanding that there was no expense to the Government involved, the House agreed to the proposition. It turned out, under the construction put upon the statute, that there was an actual expenditure of $50,000. The work, it was alleged, was a public work commenced, so that it was in order upon an appropriation bill this year to insert an appropriation of $25,000 for the continuation of this work. Thus we are involved already in an expenditure of $75,000.

In reference to this very vessel it was expressly provided that the cost of the expedition should be paid by James Gordon Bennett. With the view of making it perfectly certain that there was to be no danger of any liability on the part of the Government, the following was inserted in the statute as the last proviso:

Provided, That the Government of the United States shall not be held liable for any expenditure incurred, or to be incurred, on account of said exploration.

That is the history of this matter. This House was induced to go into it upon the idea that what we did was to be the end of the matter. This is the view that has been taken by the committee of conference. A great deal is said about the bounden duty of this Government, as a matter of humanity, to go forward in search of this crew. Nobody is on board that vessel except as a volunteer; and I trust that as this report is a matter of mutual concession all the way through, the House will see fit to agree to it. I ask the adoption of the report, and demand the previous question.

Mr. ROBESON. I ask for a second.

The SPEAKER. There is no second. The question is on ordering the main question.

Mr. BLOUNT. It requires the making out of a new report, and we cannot do it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the House that the main question may be ordered in any event, even though the report is to be voted down.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let me make a parliamentary inquiry. Is the way to reach the Jeannette matter to vote down this report?

The SPEAKER. It is the only way.

Mr. WARNER. Is not the Senate bill upon the table? We can take that up.

The SPEAKER. That is subject to the point of order.

Mr. McKENZIE. I move that the committee of conference be instructed to adhere to the amendment numbered 106.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has given notice of that.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not believe it is competent to make out another detailed statement and report and get this bill through in time.

Mr. HAWLEY. A new report would not be a page long.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is only one item.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the report.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 96.

Mr. BLOUNT. I demand tellers.

Mr. COX. I hope my friend will not take up so much time.

Mr. BLOUNT. We will take up time.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the report was disagreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to instruct the conference committee.

The SPEAKER. Put it as the opinion of the House.

Mr. ROBESON. Cannot we proceed with the regular order without binding our committee or departing from our ordinary course, because the conferees are now sufficiently informed, if they were not before, of the opinion of the House?

Mr. HAWLEY. I will make the motion in that form; that it is the opinion of the House, &c.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman will allow me, I will ask for the adoption of the report, except as to those items.

The SPEAKER. The report comes here signed by the conferees on the part of the Senate, and you cannot do it. The Chair thinks that the conferees have the opinion of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman from Connecticut to yield to me. The action taken by the House is sufficient instruction to the House conferees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia states that the action taken by the House is sufficient.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then I have nothing further to say.

Mr. KEIFER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of the House that its conferees on the sundry civil appropriation bill should insist on the right of the House to determine the compensation of its officers and employés; to resist the amendment of the Senate numbered 106 to said bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before that is voted on I want to say to the House——

Mr. KEIFER. Let me make a remark. This instruction is in accordance with precedent; and I want to add this, that in the Forty-fifth Congress, when there was a dispute between the House and the Senate as to the pay of Senate employés, the Senate insisted and insisted in conference committee upon determining the price to be paid to its own employés, and it insisted it was not the right, or at least it was not courteous on the part of the House to undertake to dictate to them what they should pay their own employés. On the 15th day of June, 1878, after the present chairman of the Committee on Appropriations had reported a disagreement in conference committee on the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, Mr. BEEBE, of New York, introduced a resolution substantially in form as this to instruct our committee to recede from its position on the subject of the pay of the employés of the Senate. And the House yielded to the Senate, and allowed the Senate to fix the pay of its own employés; and it then fixed, as it has ever since, the pay of its own employés from 10 to 40 per cent. higher than is paid the House employés, although the House employés perform more labor and work more hours than those of the Senate. These employés perform more labor and work more hours than they work in the Senate. Now, then, the allowance of a single month's extra pay will not come anywhere near compensating our employés for the difference in salaries that have been paid. The salaries of the Senate employés are largely in excess of those paid in the House for performing similar work or greater work.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to supplement what he has said by asking the Clerk to read a joint resolution which was passed by this very Congress, the Senate concurring, and showing conclusively that the Senate did not during the earlier days of this very Congress make any objection to the same proposition on the part of the House? I will ask the Clerk to read the proposition which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

[PUBLIC RESOLUTION—No. 19.]

Joint resolution to pay the employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual roll one month's extra pay.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the employés of the House borne on the annual roll one month's extra pay at the same compensation as now paid them by law, and an amount sufficient to pay the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved July 1, 1879.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I simply want to add a word now to what that resolution shows. That was a joint resolution passed at the first session of this very Congress, to which the Senate offered no objection. And, further, in conclusion, I want to say only this: that whenever we have sought to equalize the pay of the employés of the Senate and House, the Senate has met us with the assertion that it was the province of the House to regulate the pay of its own employés, and it was the right of the Senate to regulate the pay of its own employés. Now, sir, we are simply asking them to stand by their own conclusions and to allow us to fix the pay of the employés upon the annual roll and say how much they shall receive. They have always insisted upon the right to fix the salary of their own employés.

Mr. CALKINS. And we have always yielded.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir; we have always yielded that trigh to them. Now, we only ask the Senate to supplement that joint resolution which relates alone to the annual employés of the House, and to which they consented and made no objection whatever in this very Congress, yet in existence, allowing us the privilege that we demand in this matter of fixing the compensation of our employés and giving them what we believe is their right to this additional sum.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I desire that the House shall understand exactly the condition in which the conference committee finds itself in this connection. I hope that the House will fully understand that the very argument which has just been made by the gentleman from Kentucky, and made by other gentlemen advocating this proposition, has been already considered and presented as forcibly as we knew how, by the conferees on the part of the House to the conferees on the part of the Senate. Their answer is this: that in fixing your salaries in the legislative bill you have agreed as to what they were. The legislation has been already had and is now in existence to that extent. They hold that the proposition here is not to fix salaries, for they have already been fixed.

Mr. WARNER. They must be fixed by law.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes. They allege that it has been already fixed by law.

Mr. CONGER. But cannot a new law alter it?

Mr. BLOUNT. I am simply stating the facts now as they exist, if gentlemen will allow me to show what occurred in the conference committee. The merits of the matter is another question.

That is the argument they make, that this proposition is to give an extra month's pay to the employés of the House, and nothing more. We insisted that the very resolution to which the gentleman from Kentucky refers, and which has been read from the desk, was agreed to by the Senate; and their answer was yes, but it was the only one in the history of legislative proceedings where it had been done.

Mr. CONGER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. In a moment I will yield to the gentleman. I wish to say that we have the most positive assertion on the part of the conferees of the Senate that they cannot and will not yield to this proposition unless we attach another proposition to pay the annual employés of the Senate one month's compensation additional.

Mr. KEIFER. Then they are not very virtuous upon the question. It is not a desire to protect the Treasury, but if they cannot pay their own employés they are going to refuse to pay the House employés what they ought to have.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, they may not be very virtuous, but it is important for us to agree upon something before we go.

Now, as I understand this resolution, it is proposed to send us back to the Senate conferees to insist upon this paragraph as originally inserted in the House bill. In other words, to strike out the Senate amendment 106; and the probability is we shall come back as we are now. It is well enough for us to be prepared for that result. Gentlemen may say what they please in connection with this matter, but I propose to deal candidly with you and state the true facts. I am perfectly willing to go back, but I do not want to go back positively instructed by the House unless the House means it. If the House does mean it, and the question of allowing the sundry civil bill to fail is before us, I am willing to obey its command.

Mr. WARNER. It does not mean any such thing.

Mr. CONGER. If the proposition of the House is right, as I believe it to be right and just to the employés of this House, we have the right here without risking any bill to instruct our committee to emphasize the argument that has been made in this House to-day as indicative of the opinion of the House on this question.

Now, sir, our doing so does not prevent that committee from insisting on this amendment even if another amendment be connected with it. That is a question for the committee on the part of the House, to say whether they will yield to the Senate's proposition or not. For myself, sir, I would rather yield the right to the Senate to increase the pay of their employés than deprive the employés of the House of the pay which I believe they have justly earned and which I believe we ought to grant to them. If it follows that we must increase the pay of officers of the Senate, I see no reason why the committee should not take that into account and agree with an amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan is a proper one to be considered at this time.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is on the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. ATKINS. The inquiry I desire to make of the Chair is this: The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has thrown out the intimation that it is very likely this matter could be accommodated if the House conferees would agree to a simple clause in the sundry civil appropriation bill increasing the salaries of the annual employés of the Senate; and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CON-

GER] intimated that he would be willing to have that done. Now, I desire to ask the Chair if it would be competent for the conference to insert any such clause as that in this bill? In other words, is there anything at all that this conference committee can act upon except the points at issue? And the point at issue is as to the salaries of employés of the House.

Mr. CONGER. Might not the conference committee agree to that with an amendment?

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the Chair if it would be competent for the conference committee to insert any such thing?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to see the exact language before he decided. No doubt a conference committee can agree to an amendment with an amendment, but that amendment must be germane to the subject-matter in dispute. Now, whether the fact that the employés of the Senate and the House are both alike employés of Congress would make such a proposition germane or not is a matter the Chair would decide after he saw the language in which it was expressed.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to express the hope that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] may not be adopted for a different reason from the one expressed by the gentleman from Georgia. This House has insisted on different occasions within the last four or five years that the pay of the employés of the two Houses was a matter to be regulated by law, and that both Houses were alike responsible for the pay of the employés of each. The principle is just; the principle is right; and now when the Senate have come to the point of conceding the principle for which, for several years, we have contended, though at our expense, we ought, it seems to me, to avail ourselves of that concession to assert the principle that the compensation of employés is the result of a law for which the House and Senate are alike responsible.

Mr. KEIFER. There has been a very considerable discussion on this, and I now move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before that is done I want to say a single word.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not wish to yield further to a general talk on this question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not want the gentleman to yield to a general talk. But I do not want to go back to meet the Senate conferees blind upon this matter. We may as well be simple and direct on this issue with the Senate. We have a bill involving $21,000,000 upon which there is no disagreement and no likelihood of a disagreement except upon this question. The House has information that the Senate conferees, supported by the opinion of the Senate, as elicited in the debate which is to be found in the RECORD, are unwilling that this provision shall go in unless a similar provision shall be inserted as to the Senate employés. Why, therefore, Mr. Speaker, should we not settle now the question as to whether we will go that far or not?

Mr. BAKER. I have an amendment touching that very point which I desire to offer to the resolution now pending.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let the amendment be read. Let us hear what it is.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; let it be read.

Mr. BAKER. That will bring up the whole question.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed to be offered by Mr. BAKER, as follows:

That it is the opinion of the House that their conferees yield to the Senate conferees touching the subject of the pay and salaries of the Senate employés.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not yield for the purpose of admitting that amendment.

Mr. BAKER. There is no use of sending our conferees back until that question is settled. And I insist I have the right to offer that amendment. The previous question has not been ordered.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] was on the floor and had demanded the previous question on his resolution, as he had a right to do, in order to test the sense of the House.

Mr. KEIFER. I simply yielded to the gentleman from Indiana to have the amendment read; not that it should be offered.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will allow the amendment to be voted on.

Mr. KEIFER. It is utterly inconsistent with the resolutions.

Mr. BAKER. On the contrary, it is a necessary part of it. There is no use in talking about coming to an agreement unless the sense of the House is known on the very subject embraced in the resolution.

Mr. KEIFER. The sense of the House will be known in a moment, if it can possibly be known any better than it is now when by a unanimous vote of this House we put this clause into the sundry civil bill. The conference committee must know very well what is the sense of the House upon that matter. And I propose by this resolution to inform them it is the sense of this House we shall deal justly with our own employés.

I yield for a single remark to my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CONGER. Wait a moment. I desire to say that we stand here to-night asserting the right of the House to pay its own employés as it thinks best. Shall we not give the same right to the Senate?

Mr. BAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. Can we maintain our proposition of the right of the House over the pay and compensation of its own employés without admitting the same right on the part of the Senate? We instruct our committee to insist upon the proposition as to the House, and in doing so we also recognize the right of the Senate to do the same.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire now to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WARNER. I deny the right of either House to fix the salaries—[cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. There will be no voting until quiet is restored.

Mr. KEIFER. I insist upon my demand for the previous question.

Mr. BLOUNT. And now I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to inquire of the Chair if after the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has been acted upon it will not be competent for the House to act upon the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER?]

Mr. CONGER. Wait until that time comes.

The SPEAKER. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." The Chair will decide that point when it comes up. The question is now upon ordering the main question upon the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

The main question was ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. KEIFER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. I now offer my proposition which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. KEIFER. I make the point of order that that is not in order, because it relates to no substantive thing in the sundry civil bill upon which there has been any disagreement whatever. It only looks to a compromise on additional matters.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope that if there is anything in the point of order the gentleman will not insist upon it, but let the House vote upon the proposition.

Mr. BAKER. Let my proposition be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That it is the opinion of the House that their conferees yield to the Senate conferees touching the subject of the pay and salaries of the Senate employés.

Mr. KEIFER. I must insist upon my point of order. That proposition is an invitation to the Senate to do that which, in the consideration of the sundry civil bill, they did not vote to do at all. It is not proper for us to invite them to act upon the matter at all. We had better stand on our own dignity and on our own rights in relation to this matter, and not tender to the Senate that which is not necessary.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to be heard upon the point of order. There can certainly be nothing in the point of order. It is entirely competent for the House to instruct its conferees, or to express an opinion to them touching any subject-matter that by any possibility may come before them. The question as to how far the House shall instruct its conferees is a question for the judgment of the House, and no point of order can lie against it at all.

We might as well confront this question here and now as at any other time. It has been brought distinctly before the House. The House has been notified that unless we are prepared to yield to the demand of the Senate that they shall be permitted to fix the pay and salary of their own employés on just such basis as they see fit, regardless of our views and judgment, this proposition of the House will not be agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. One word.

Mr. ROBESON. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. I believe the point of order is well taken and should be insisted upon; yet, as many gentlemen about me think it should not be made at this time, I will withdraw it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I renew the point of order. My point of order is that it is not competent for this House in the present stage of this bill to submit to the conferees any subject not originally submitted to them. This subject is not in conference, and we cannot give any instructions concerning a matter not in conference.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to say a word.

Mr. REED. There is no need for any further instructions to the conferees. There will not be any trouble about the House sustaining them, if they deem it proper and suitable to yield to the Senate on this matter. The House has expressed its opinion upon the subject of disagreement, and our conferees can understand without further resolutions of instructions.

Mr. KEIFER. If the Senate insists upon not paying the employés of the House, I hope the conferees never will agree.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House can express its opinion upon any question, and the will of the House will be taken into consideration by the conference committee. But the Chair decides that the point of order is well taken; that that which is in the bill by a vote of the two Houses, being a substantive proposition, cannot be changed in the conference.

Mr. McMILLIN. And any change of the bill in that respect would be liable to a point of order when the bill came back.

The SPEAKER. There may be some provision in the bill to which the amendment might be attached, but to anticipate in this way by a resolution the Chair thinks is not within the scope of the rule or parliamentary practice.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then, Mr. Speaker, I shall assume no authority as a House conferee to put anything in this bill except what, under the rules of this House, I am authorized to put there.

Mr. KEIFER. That is all right.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am therefore left with nothing to do except to agree to this Senate amendment or refuse to agree, and there to stand to the end.

Mr. KEIFER. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. McMAHON, and Mr. MONROE as the committee on the part of the House in the further conference upon the sundry civil appropriation bill.

GEORGE SMITH.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 465) granting an increase of pension to George Smith.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. UPSON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for concurrence in an amendment of the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 5521) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and acts amendatory thereof.

There being no objection, the amendment of the Senate, which was to strike out section 2 of the bill, was read and concurred in.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 853) granting a pension to Caroline Stief;

A bill (H. R. No. 1453) for the relief of James R. Gordon;

A bill (H. R. No. 1649) granting a pension to William W. Church;

A bill (H. R. No. 2180) granting an increase of pension to James H. Reeve;

A bill (H. R. No. 3786) granting a pension to William C. Parker;

A bill (H. R. No. 4608) granting a pension to Betsey Elwell; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5677) granting a pension to Stephen P. Benton.

SLACKWATER NAVIGATION.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution calling for information to be reported to the next Congress. This resolution has been agreed to by the Committee on Commerce, and I am sure that after it has been read, there will be no objection to it.

Mr. PAGE. We will hear it read, reserving the right to object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to investigate and ascertain through the Corps of Engineers of the Army what mills and manufacturing and other establishments owned or operated by persons or corporations are being run by water-power furnished from locks and dams on streams which have been improved or are now being improved by the United States for slackwater navigation; that he report on this subject to the next session of Congress, and that this examination and report shall also extend to and cover all private works and business carried on by water-power furnished by any public work or improvement made or being made by the United States for slackwater navigation.

Mr. REAGAN. This resolution is reported as the unanimous action of the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CONVERSE. I object unless the resolution is read again. We could not understand it.

Mr. BROWNE. I heard it read, and I object.

Mr. WHITE. I think it is a good thing.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read again.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. That seems to refer to water-power above improvements and above navigation.

Mr. McCOOK. It seems to me simply a supplemental river and harbor bill.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

MRS. ANNA I. GUEST.

The next Senate bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 972) granting a pension to Mrs. Anna I. Guest; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Anna I. Guest, widow of John Guest, late commodore in the United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. CLYMER. I call for the reading of the report in this case.

The SPEAKER. There is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. CLYMER. There ought to be some explanatory statement. The amount of the pension appears to be excessive. There are many widows of commodores and admirals who do not receive such a pension.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read a paper connected with the case that may give some information.

The Clerk read as follows:

The petitioner, Mrs. Anna J. Guest, is the widow of the late Commodore John Guest, United States Navy, who died in command of the Portsmouth navy-yard on June 11, 1879, having five children, three of whom are sons under sixteen years of age.

The petitioner is now in receipt of a monthly pension of $30, which she asks to be increased to $50 a month.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced the passage of the following bills, without amendment:

A bill (H. R. No. 1650) for the relief of Edward T. Brownell;

A bill (H. R. No. 4438) for the relief of William Redus;

A bill (H. R. No. 4905) to declare the true intent and meaning of an act to reimburse the State of Kentucky for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion, approved June 8, 1872;

A bill (H. R. No. 6034) for the relief of the personal representatives of George W. Henderlite;

A bill (H. R. No. 6478) for the relief of Levi Price; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6860) for the relief of William H. Davis.

The message also announced the passage of the bill (S. No. 2022) in relation to the Japanese indemnity fund, in which concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

LIMIT OF CONGRESSIONAL TERM.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I notice that the hour of twelve o'clock has arrived, and I make the point of order that the Forty-sixth Congress has expired, and I desire to say a few words in connection with it. I know very well what the practice has been, but I desire to have the Clerk read section 26 of the law upon that subject.

Mr. ROBESON. If the point of order is correct, the gentleman himself is out of order, because he is no longer a member of this House.

Mr. COX. He is just ten minutes too late.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I ask the Clerk to read the twenty-sixth section of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

The time for holding elections in any State, district, or Territory, for a Representative or delegate to fill a vacancy, whether such vacancy is caused by a failure to elect at the time prescribed by law, or by the death, resignation, or incapacity of a person elected, may be prescribed by the laws of the several States and Territories, respectively.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read in this connection the twenty-fifth section of the Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, in the year 1876, is established as the day, in each of the States and Territories of the United States, for the election of Representatives and Delegates to the Forty-sixth Congress; and the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, in every second year thereafter, is established as the day for the election, in each of said States and Territories, of Representatives and Delegates to the Congress commencing on the 4th day of March next thereafter.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I did not call for the reading of the twenty-fifth section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair called for the reading of that section.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to say but a word further upon this subject. If I could think of a word, a single word, in the English language that would express what I desire to say to the House, I would use that word. But I cannot find one single word to express what I feel upon the point of order which I have made.

Now, I say to this House that if the lightning had stricken the President of the United States at ten minutes before twelve o'clock to-night—[cries of "Louder!"] Louder! do you take me for a jackass? You must do your own braying. [Great laughter.] If you will be still you can hear me without interrupting me.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a gentleman here upon this floor to-night who feels or believes, and I think if he was required to put his hand upon his heart he would be unwilling to deny that the 4th of March has arrived. It has arrived.

The Ides of March have come, but not passed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a single word in illustration of what I have to say here. I was about to say that if the President of the United States should have died at ten minutes before twelve o'clock, who would deny that the incoming President might have been sworn in by a justice of the peace or anybody else authorized to administer an oath, and entered upon the duties of his office at the hour of twelve o'clock this morning, this day, the 4th of March? If that is true, we must admit it. If it is not true, deny it, and show me where the statement is wrong. But if it is true, I repeat we must admit it to be a fact, and the term for which you have been elected members of this Congress has expired and you cannot make a ruling here which is to override the law.

If you can make the legislative day extend to to-morrow, cannot you make it extend to twelve o'clock on the next day and twelve o'clock on the day after, and so on indefinitely and extend it perpetually to the end of all time? It is not necessary, sir, that I should repeat that argument. You are sensible men, you understand language, you understand the force of words; the law is plain and clear. I ask your attention to it.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I have the floor and do not mean to be taken off it. I have submitted to that process long enough. I am speaking in good earnest and from my heart.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the point of order made by the gentleman as a very substantial one, which has occasioned from time to time in the history of this country much discussion. The Chair will listen to the gentleman's statement on the point of order and will, as far as is in his power, answer it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to say I make the point of order in good faith. I make it on my judgment of the law and under a sense of my high obligations as a member of this House. I believe that the time for which this Congress was elected has expired. Whatever the practice may have been, here is a law which overrides all practice. If Congress by its practice, or by its rules, can override the written obligations of the law, we might as well cease to enact law on this and all other subjects.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to answer the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. ROBESON. Does the Chair desire any further debate?

The SPEAKER. He does not. This point of order has from time to time been made in the history of this country, and was the subject of enlarged discussion by some of the ablest men the country has ever produced; such men as Mr. Benton, Mr. Cass, and others. The Chair supposes the practice of Congress in this connection is based on the fact that it does not recognize the calendar day, but recognizes the legislative day. The legislative day of the 3d of March does not expire until twelve o'clock noon on the 4th of March. Practice construes the law. In 1851 this question came up in the House of Representatives, as the Chair is advised, on a resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia, who is now a member of this House, [Mr. STEPHENS.] On the 3d of March, 1851, Mr. STEPHENS offered a resolution to test this question, and on the ruling of Speaker Cobb it was decided that the Congress expired at noon on the 4th of March; which ruling has been in effect ever since.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. That was in 1854.

The SPEAKER. No, sir; in 1851.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Then I call the attention of the Speaker to the date of the law.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has sent for the Journal of that day. This memorandum has been sent to the Chair by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES.]

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to ask the Speaker one single question, and then I have done. It is if Congress can extend the legislative day till twelve o'clock to-morrow, I ask the Speaker whether it may not extend it till twelve o'clock of the next day?

The SPEAKER. That has never been done.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. It matters not what has been done. I make that parliamentary inquiry of the Chair, and I want the Chair to answer it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that question when the attempt is made to extend the legislative day beyond noon of the 4th of March.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to have stated the date of the law to show whether the action the Chair has referred to is prior to the law I sent to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. WILSON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated what is the practice and has sent for the Journal containing the decision to which he has referred.

Mr. PAGE. Is it in order to call for the regular order?

Mr. ROBESON. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order.

Mr. ROBESON. My question of order is, that we are here endeavoring to transact public business, and we should transact it in a decent way, as becomes reputable men. I say that this House is not in order. And if this disturbance is meant as another form of filibustering against the progress of public business and the passage of pension bills [cries of "Oh!" "Oh!"] I want the country to understand it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have order.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from New Jersey his opinion, as a lawyer and a statesman, on the question I have raised.

Mr. ROBESON. I would be glad to answer the gentleman if it were in order to do so.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to answer me.

Mr. ROBESON. I will make a single remark in answer to the gentleman in order to save time. The gentleman has asked me a question as to my opinion as a lawyer. This question does not present itself to the House as an original question. Whatever may be the language of the law, I say that it is the accepted practice of this country for more than eighty years that laws are construed by constant consent or universal practice.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. And I deny it.

PRINTING EULOGIES ON HON. FERNANDO WOOD.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That 8,000 copies of the eulogies delivered on the late FERNANDO WOOD, a member of the Forty-sixth Congress from the State of New York, together with a portrait of the deceased, executed under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, be printed; 6,000 copies thereof for the use of the House and 2,000 for the use of the Senate.

The resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I now move that this House adjourn sine die.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to offer a resolution in regard to documents.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I will yield for that.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. WHITE. I ask consent to submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That all documents and books ordered by the present Congress to be published, and which are actually printed prior to the 1st Monday of December next, shall be allotted as heretofore to the members of the present Congress and transmitted to their residences as fast as printed, unless otherwise ordered by the members themselves.

Mr. COX. That is a copy of a former resolution.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. The regular order is my motion to adjourn sine die.

Mr. WHITE. Is there any objection to my resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

There being no objection, the resolution of Mr. WHITE was adopted.

LIMIT OF THE CONGRESSIONAL TERM.

The SPEAKER. In regard to the point made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SINGLETON] the Chair will state that on the 3d of March, 1851, at two minutes after twelve o'clock, midnight, Mr. STEPHENS moved that the House adjourn sine die, just as the gentleman from Illinois now does. The authority to which the Chair has referred is evidently based upon the vote on that motion as being a test whether the House had a right to sit until twelve o'clock noon the 4th of March. The vote on that occasion, upon the motion to adjourn sine die at twelve o'clock midnight of the 3d of March, was ayes 30, noes 153. That has been construed as the judgment of the House on the subject, and the Chair is advised that ever since that time the practice of the House has been uniform in that regard.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I now insist upon my motion to take a recess until half past nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. The Speaker has read an authority in reply to the point of order which I made. I desire to say that that was a decision made before the law was passed which I have sent up to be read at the Clerk's desk, and cannot be quoted as the construction of that law.

The SPEAKER. The House can now express its judgment on the subject by a vote on the motion which the gentleman makes that the House adjourn sine die.

Mr. KEIFER. I make the point of order that that motion is not in order.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, let us vote on it.

Mr. KEIFER. Very well.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, and it was not agreed to, upon a viva voce vote, there being one vote only in the affirmative.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I have voted in the affirmative anyway. [Laughter.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAGE. I now call for the regular order.

Mr. HOOKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] for a recess.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I withdraw that motion, as I understand we may have a conference report very soon.

Mr. COBB. The report of the committee of conference on the deficiency appropriation bill will be ready in a very few moments, as the committee have come to an agreement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House had better remain in session until the conference report on the deficiency appropriation bill comes in.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I give notice now that I will bring before the Supreme Court the question I have raised upon every bill that is passed by this House after this time.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 1830) granting a pension to Peter Grattan; and

A bill (H. R. No. 7111) restoring the name of Andrew J. Pennel to the pension-roll.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had further insisted on its amendment disagreed to by the House to the sundry civil appropriation bill; had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. BECK, Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, and Mr. WINDOM.

ABUSE OF THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CONVERSE. I rise to submit a privileged report, which I move be laid upon the table and printed. I understand that my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BROWNE,] desires to submit the views of the minority.

Mr. WHITE. What is the report?

Mr. BROWNE. It is a report from a select committee that is authorized to report at any time.

Mr. WHITE. What is the report about?

Mr. BROWNE. It is a report from the select committee on the abuse of the franking privilege. I ask that the views of the minority be printed with the report of the majority. I suppose the chairman of the committee returns to the House the evidence taken and will ask to have it referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. CONVERSE. The resolution appointing the committee did not require it to report the evidence taken by them; only their findings.

Mr. VALENTINE. Was not the committee required to report the evidence?

Mr. CONVERSE. No; there was no instructions to that effect.

Mr. VALENTINE. The evidence ought to be published. I desire to inquire if the House is not entitled to have the evidence in this case printed?

The SPEAKER. The report will be read, and then the views of the minority will be read.

Mr. VALENTINE. I do not care about the report being read——

Mr. CLYMER. I think it ought to be.

Mr. VALENTINE. But I think the House should have the testimony printed with these reports—all the testimony taken by the committee.

The SPEAKER. It is a question for the House to determine.

Mr. VALENTINE. If it be in order, I move that the testimony be printed with the report.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

Mr. COFFROTH. Does it not require unanimous consent to have the report read?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. It requires the consent of one member only.

Mr. COFFROTH, (to Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois.) Are you the Speaker?

The Clerk proceeded to read the report. Before the reading was concluded,

Mr. PAGE said: I make the point of order that this matter has no business before the House. The House is operating under a suspension of the rules; and although this is a privileged report, it could not properly come before the House at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. MCLANE.) The Chair will say to the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] that even if the point of order were good, it comes altogether too late.

Mr. PAGE. But I was not here. [Laughter.] This matter ought not to have been entertained by the Speaker. We are operating under a suspension of the rules, and no business is in order except to execute the order of the House.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) It was entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRIGGS. If these reports have been ordered to be printed, I move to dispense with the further reading.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The reports were received by unanimous consent, and if there be no objection will be ordered to be printed.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire now moves to dispense with the further reading.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BRIGGS. I have no objection to printing the report in the RECORD; but it seems to me proper we should not take up the time of the House and weary the clerks by continuing the reading.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not hear any objection to dispensing with the further reading.

Mr. BROWNE. Do I understand that the House has dispensed with the further reading of the report?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not hear any objection, and assumed that unanimous consent was given.

Mr. BROWNE. If so, then, as a member of the committee, I move that the committee be directed to report to the House the testimony taken by it, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and printed. The committee has taken voluminous testimony in the matter to which these reports relate. I move that the committee be directed to report that testimony to the House, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and be printed with the report.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I demanded the reading of this report, and it cannot be assumed that I have waived that demand until I have assented to dispensing with the reading.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman is too late; unanimous consent has been given; and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] had submitted a motion.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. If I had not demanded the reading, it might have been assumed that I assented to dispensing with it; but as I made that demand, no one had any right to assume the demand was waived.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair put to the House the question whether there was objection to dispensing with the reading. No objection being made the Chair directed the Clerk to suspend the further reading. Then the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] was recognized, and has made a motion which the Chair will now put to the House.

Mr. BROWNE. I want to put a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair. The Chair is correct in saying that by unanimous consent the further reading of these reports was dispensed with. Is it true that the report, a part of which has been read, will be printed in the RECORD to-morrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The entire report will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BROWNE. If so, I ask that the views of the minority, no part of which has been read, may also be printed in the RECORD. [Cries of "All right!" and "No objection!"]

The report is as follows:

The select committee appointed to investigate abuses connected with the transmission of letters, documents, and other matter through the mails of the United States beg leave to make the following report:

The resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted January 11, 1881, under which said committee was appointed, reads as follows:

"Whereas charges have been made that the laws of the United States have been violated by sending through the mail, under the frank of members of the House of Representatives and the Senate, of matter not authorized to be sent without the payment of postage:

"Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed by the Speaker of this House to examine into said charges and all other abuses that may be brought to their attention connected with the transmission of letters, documents, or other matter through the mails of the United States; that said committee shall have power to sit during the sessions of the House, to send for persons, papers, and records, to administer oaths, and to report to this House, by bill or otherwise, its findings and conclusions at any time. The expense of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House."

Immediately after appointment your committee organized, and on the 14th of January, 1881, began the takingrof testimony on the subject mentioned in the resolution. They have examined to ty-one witnesses and held twenty-four sessions of the committee.

The statutes providing for and regulating free matter passing through the mails of the United States are embraced in sections 5 and 7 of the act of March 3, 1875, United States Statutes, volume 18, page 343, and section 1 of the act of March 3, 1879, United States Statutes, volume 20, page 356, and are as follows:

"SEC. 5. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or any part thereof, or speeches, or reports therein contained, shall, under the frank of a member of Congress or Delegate, to be written by himself, be carried in the mail free of postage under such rules and regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe."

"SEC. 7. That seed transmitted by the Commissioner of Agriculture, or by any member of Congress or Delegate receiving seed for distribution from said Department, together with agricultural reports emanating from this Department and so transmitted, shall, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe, pass through the mails free of charge."

"And the provisions of this section shall apply to ex-Members of Congress and ex-Delegates for the period of nine months after the expiration of their terms as Members and Delegates."

"SECTION 1, (act of March 3, 1879.) Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, may send and receive through the mails free all public documents printed by order of Congress; and the name of each Senator, Representative, Delegate, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House shall be written thereon with the proper designation of the office he holds, and the provisions of this section shall apply to each of the persons named herein until the first Monday of December following the expiration of their respective terms of office."

It will be observed that the last-named act is an extension of the privileges of the mails beyond that authorized by the act of 1875. Both require the name of the officer to be written on the document; but no frank is required to send seeds or reports from the Agricultural Department through the mails—whether sent by the Commissioner of Agriculture or a member of Congress. That act authorizes each Senator, Member, Delegate, the Clerk of the Senate and Clerk of the House to receive the designated matter through the mails free of postage, as well as to send it free. The officer could not be expected to frank the documents which he is entitled to receive free. The law therefore must contemplate that the name and designation of office may be written by another. The earlier statute provides that the business shall be done "under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe." That provision is omitted in the act of 1879.

Your committee are of opinion that the object and intention of Congress in the enactments was to give the designated matter free passage in the United States mails rather than create a privilege for the officer who may send it. The distribution of documents, seeds, and cuttings is an onerous and laborious official duty. The purpose of the law was not to benefit the officer or representative, but it was to benefit the constituent and voter, and keep him advised as far as possible of the transactions of the Government. So that whoever sends documents printed by order of Congress, through the mails, whether reports or speeches, to be distributed among the people, contributes to the spread of intelligence and knowledge, and promotes the primary objects and purposes of the statute.

Your committee find that the practice of permitting clerks of committees and private secretaries or some political or personal friend to frank documents has prevailed with a majority of Senators and Members under the present as well as former laws regulating the franking of documents. This delegation of authority, though not a violation of law, is liable to abuse, and especially so when the first agent is permitted to employ as many different persons as he chooses to assist him in the work of franking. The latter practice is vicious, and ought to be condemned. Whether known to Members and Senators or not, it has been practiced to a very considerable extent by both political parties during heated political contests.

The law does not require the officer to certify or designate the character of the document. A large number of Senators and Members of Congress have used for years a fac-simile frank, and matter so franked has been permitted in the mails by postmasters throughout the country.

Your committee are not prepared to say that practice is illegal; but as in the other mode of franking it is liable to abuse. As long as it covers only a franked document no harm is done.

Your committee find that of the thirteen democratic members whose names were reported by the postmaster at Washington in the papers sent to your committee to have been found on envelopes detained in his office, eleven gave permission for the use of their names by some clerk or friend in sending such matter as was, under the law, frankable. One did not give his consent. He was written to for that purpose, but did not reply to the letter. As to the thirteenth name, the postmaster himself was mistaken. He had no envelopes with that member's name on them. A very large number of franked envelopes were furnished on the application of the secretary of the democratic congressional committee by the democratic members of Congress at or before the opening of the last political campaign, to be used in sending to their constituents or into their respective States frankable documents, and in several cases particular clerks or friends of the member were authorized to use the frank, and in some instances the secretary of the democratic committee was given permission to do so. So far as your committee could learn, no complaint has ever been made of any improper use of franked envelopes to cover unfrankable matter. Franked envelopes were furnished from time to time by committee clerks and by members for such proper use to the end of the campaign. Your committee find that franking by the hand of another has been practiced by members of all parties ever since the franking privilege was granted.

As to the republican congressional committee and their mode of sending out documents, your committee find that fifty-six republican Members and Senators either directly consented to the use of their respective names for franking documents by the republican congressional committee, or wrote to that committee for documents to be sent into their respective districts or States, which was construed into a consent for the use of their respective franks for that purpose; and their franks were accordingly used by the committee. The assistant secretary testified that whenever he sent documents into any district he always used the frank of the member of that district if a republican; but if such district was represented by a democrat, then he used the frank of some republican Member or Senator from that State. He said he put on the frank without any authority whatever, and that the exigencies of the business required it; and he supposed others did the same way. The greater part of five millions of documents were sent out and distributed to every congressional district in the United States from the republican headquarters in Washington through the Washington post-office under a stamped frank, notwithstanding the Washington postmaster testified that he could tell a stamped from a written one, and that he had carefully scrutinized the mail matter from the republican headquarters during the entire canvass, and that none of it bore a stamped frank. Your committee further find that one of the clerks in the Washington post-office himself used a stamp in said office, and sent out therefrom mail matter under such frank. Your committee are of opinion that the use of a stamp or fac-simile frank by a member of Congress to cover matter which by law is free in the mails of the United States is not a violation of the law. Your committee further find that the Washington postmaster, without legal process and in violation of the post-office laws, sent 9,000 franked envelopes by mail without the payment of postage from Washington to Pottsville, Pennsylvania, to be used in behalf of a republican editor at that place in a suit with a member of this House, thus doing himself the very act which he charged upon others.

It is true, as charged, that eleven mail bags, containing boxes of franked envelopes without any inclosures in them, came to the Washington post-office on or about the 20th of September, 1880, directed to Duncan S. Walker, secretary, &c., at the democratic committee-rooms, under the frank of a Senator. Where they came from the postmaster does not and could not know. The stamps on the tags indicate that they came from New York. The directions on the tags had been changed, some name having been scratched off and Duncan S. Walker's name put on. The frank of the Senator is not in that gentleman's handwriting. Who put it there does not appear. Who franked the envelopes does not appear. The envelopes bear the names of democratic congressmen. Duncan S. Walker is of opinion that the envelopes had been sent by mistake (supposing they were documents) from Washington to New York, and when it was found out that they were only envelopes that they were returned in the same manner in which they had been sent, but he has no knowledge on the subject. The Washington postmaster is of opinion that they were sent from Washington to New York by mail, and not being used were returned to Washington again.

By a singular coincidence, about the same day (20th of September) a package was returned to the Washington post-office as "rejected," or "not delivered," from Newton, Ohio, which was said to have broken open accidentally in transit, and which, it is said, contained under frank documents not frankable, and of the same character as those being circulated by the democratic party. Neither the frank nor the documents thus coming from Newton, Ohio, were ever shown to either the chairman, secretary, or any member of the democratic committee. Neither has it been exhibited to your committee.

By the same singularity, on or about the same day (September 20) a republican employé of the democratic committee went to the Washington post-office and gave information that unfrankable matter was being put up and sent off under frank from one of the rooms at democratic headquarters. It turns out that another republican by the name of Gibson was in charge at that room with thirty or forty employés under him. Still further complicating the events which thus came together, the Washington postmaster states that in changing the mail which came from the democratic committee-rooms, either on that or the next day, some of the bundles accidentally broke open, and the postmaster discovered that some of the documents in the packages under frank were not frankable. None of the packages or documents thus found to be unfrankable were ever returned to the democratic committee-rooms or shown to any member of it, nor has any of it been exhibited to your committee. All of the mail from the democratic committee-rooms which accumulated at the Washington post-office for several days from and after the 20th of September was detained, and amounted to thirty or forty bags. Correspondence was then had between the postmaster and Walker, and the packages which had not been opened were returned to the committee-rooms and on examination found to be correct, with the exception that some paid matter was slightly overweight, and in one package one of the employés found a dozen speeches, unfrankable, put with frankable matter, but that fact was first made known in the testimony before your committee.

The bags of mail matter thus returned were taken to the democratic committee-rooms and opened publicly in the presence of a number of the employés, who were witnesses before your committee, and so far as the testimony shows nothing was found to show intentional fraud, or which might not have occurred by accident. The paid matter was reduced, returned to the mails, and the residue sent by express, for the reason, as Walker states, that he was then in receipt of between three or four hundred letters of recent date complaining that his correspondents had not received remittances of documents sent by mail, and he concluded that democratic documents were being detained in the post-offices of the country for political reasons. A hundred or more of the letters have been submitted to your committee, showing complaints that the writers had failed to receive documents.

Gibson, the republican in charge of the room, and Redgate and Galer, two republicans under him, testify to putting up frankable and unfrankable matter in the same package; and Gibson testifies that he was directed by McDonnell, who was chief clerk under Walker, to put it up in that way with the frankable matter on the outside and the unfrankable matter on the inside of the package, so that when franked if it should be opened by accident or otherwise the frankable matter would be exposed and the unfrankable concealed. Two of the three persons say that they saw franked slips pasted on some of the packages of unfrankable matter. On the other hand, McDonnell testified that he had never given such instructions to Gibson or any one else. He says, on the contrary, he frequently cautioned all the persons employed, including Gibson, to be very careful to keep those packages which were frankable from those that contained unfrankable matter. Walker supports McDonnell in this; and ten employés were examined by your committee who testify that they heard these cautions frequently given, four of whom testify to hearing that caution given by McDonnell to Gibson himself on different occasions during the canvass.

In the midst of these contradictions we are obliged to look to the witnesses themselves to determine which statement is probably true.

1. The three witnesses are contradicted by ten or twelve witnesses of equal character and intelligence in some particulars.

2. The three are republicans testifying about their political opponents.

3. One of them was dismissed from the service of the democratic committee for taking that which did not belong to him, on account of which he threatened vengeance against the members of the committee. He told the messenger who subpœnaed him that he expected the republicans to do something for him on account of his infamy on the democratic committee, but that they had not done so yet. Mr. Gibson has shown zeal in visiting and talking to the witnesses who concurred with him before they gave their testimony. While he was foreman of the room he was discovered sending a package or packages of unfrankable matter under a member's frank to some of his friends in Pennsylvania, and was severely reprimanded therefor and told he would be discharged if it was ever repeated.

Your committee are therefore of opinion that the charges made against the democratic congressional committee are not sustained by the proof. The democratic and republican committees both did their business in much the same manner. Both frankable and unfrankable documents were kept in and distributed from the same room. Some of the matter was sent off in single envelopes. Three different classes of matter were put up and sent off in packages. Some packages were composed exclusively of frankable matter. This class, together with that put in single envelopes, was intended to be sent under frank. Another class of packages was composed of both frankable and unfrankable documents, and were called "sets," consisting of one or more documents of each kind printed by the respective political parties. Another class consisted exclusively of unfrankable matter. The two latter classes were intended to be sent by mail on payment of postage, or by express. From ten to thirteen millions of documents were distributed by each committee within the space of a few weeks. That there should be mistakes in so large and crowded a business, that packages which were frankable should be sent by express or under postage, and some that were unfrankable should get mixed with those that were frankable, and so escape the payment of postage, is not marvelous. But that there was any intention to perpetrate any frauds on the part of either the republican or democratic congressional committees by improper use of the franking privilege is not proven, and your committee do not believe.

Your committee find that Government envelopes, which are furnished under the law by the various departments and executive offices of the Government for themselves to cover, under penalty, only official correspondence, and which pass free in the mails of the United States, are in fact used for the transmission of other than official matter. Three of the five members of your committee have received through the mails in such envelopes matter chargeable with postage. Your committee have like information from two Senators and several Members of the House, and the testimony likewise shows that many such envelopes are dropped in the street mail-boxes or at the Washington post-office which would not be likely to occur if used by executive offices, because their mail is taken several times each day by carriers directly from the Departments, and there would be no occasion to drop official communications in the street boxes or at the city post-office. These envelopes are manufactured by the million, by different parties, on contract, and there is as great a variety in the style as the executive offices are numerous, thus affording every facility for, if not inviting, frauds upon the postal revenues. This evil ought to be remedied.

Your committee recommend on this point for Government envelopes which shall pass free in the mail—

1. That they should be made out of special paper manufactured for that particular purpose, which could not be easily counterfeited. If so made the paper could be made light and strong, and being manufactured in large quantities would not cost more than by the present mode.

2. Each envelope should have the impression of an engraved die upon it, which could not be easily counterfeited.

3. Each executive officer should be required, under severe penalties, and before the envelope and contents should be received into the mails, if sealed, to place a written or stamped certificate on the same after it is so sealed, certifying that it contains only official free matter, and also the date when so used.

The views of the minority are as follows:

The undersigned do not agree with the majority in some of their conclusions, nor do we think the report of the committee on some points sustained by the evidence. We therefore briefly express the views of the minority.

There were three instances only brought to the attention of the committee in which the evidence tended to show a violation of the postal laws of the United States in the transmission of matter through the mails:

1. A large number of empty envelopes, purporting to bear upon them the frank of Hon. J. W. RYON, were, some time in the month of November last, forwarded in a mail pouch and by mail from the post-office at Washington to Pottsville, Pennsylvania. The circumstances were these: Mr. RYON had caused a prosecution to be instituted against the editor of the Pottsville Republican for libel in falsely charging him (Mr. RYON) with the illegal use of the franking privilege. Certain empty envelopes, bearing what purported to be Mr. RYON'S frank, had been received by mail at the Washington post-office and were detained there. These envelopes were thought to be important evidence by the defendant in his defense to the libel suit, and he sent an attorney to Washington to secure their use as evidence on the trial. In the absence of Mr. Ainger, the postmaster, Mr. Bell and Mr. Springer, two of the employés in the post-office, one having charge of the city delivery and the other of the out-going mails, caused these envelopes to be sent by mail so they might be used at the trial. The packages were not postage paid, and were forwarded in violation of law, but we think the circumstances fully acquit these gentlemen of any criminal purpose.

2. There was received at the Washington post-office, through the mails in sacks, some seventy-seven thousand two hundred and fifty empty envelopes. These envelopes bore what purported to be the franks of members of Congress, the names of twelve democratic members being used.

The tags attached to the mail sacks bore the purported frank of Hon. W. A. WALLACE. The post-office from which this matter was forwarded is not clearly shown, but we believe the evidence justifies us in the conclusion that it was the city of New York. From the appearance of the tags we also believe it was first sent by mail from Washington to New York. By whom it was sent the evidence does not show, although the circumstances leave no doubt that the envelopes were prepared under the auspices of the democratic national committee at Washington. The evidence shows that the signature or purported frank of Senator WALLACE is not genuine. That the transmission through the mails of this matter, without the payment of postage, was unlawful, we assume will not be controverted. We are not able to fix the responsibility of this transaction upon any individual. There is no evidence tending to show that any of the gentlemen whose names were borne on the envelopes had any connection with it.

3. The gravest charge which the committee was called upon to investigate was that one J. B. McDonnell, who was an employé of the democratic national committee, and engaged as a general superintendent of the business of folding and forwarding its political documents, directed some of his employés to put up for transmission through the mails under frank, matter known not to be frankable under the law. The evidence as to this charge is voluminous, and it is impossible now, in the closing hours of this session, to review it in detail.

One W. H. Gibson was in the employ of the democratic national committee from about the first of September until some time in October. He had supervision of the folders of documents in one of the corridors of the Capitol. He testifies that McDonnell gave him instructions to put up packages with frankable matter on the outside and such as was not frankable on the inside; that this matter was to be and was franked, and was removed for transmission by mail. Gibson's testimony is corroborated by that of Joseph H. Galer, W. S. Ridgate, and Samuel J. Price, also employés of the democratic committee. It is strengthened by the fact that matter put up as described by him was actually found in the mails.

Some twenty or more mail sacks of franked matter sent to the post-office at Washington by the democratic committee for transmission through the mails were detained in that office by the postmaster for the reason that one or more of the packages which had accidentally been broken open were found to contain matter not entitled to go out under frank. This matter was delivered to the democratic committee upon the order of General Walker, its secretary.

Against the conclusion to which the above facts inevitably lead is interposed the testimony of Mr. McDonnell, who testifies that he never gave Gibson or any other person directions to fold or send unfrankable matter under cover of a frank, but he was careful to direct precisely the contrary. Numerous employés testify that McDonnell repeatedly enjoined them to be careful in keeping the matter to be sent under frank and that requiring payment of postage separate, so that none would be illegally sent. It is also in evidence that the mail matter returned from the Washington post-office for attempted violation of the franking privilege was subjected to examination, package by package, by General Walker, and but one unfrankable package at most was found therein.

However this may be, it is admitted that these facts were not communicated to the postmaster at Washington; that this matter was not returned to that office for transmission, but was all sent out afterward by express.

General Walker's explanation of these admitted facts is, first, that he had received many letters complaining that the writers did not receive their documents sent by mail, and he forwarded these by express to make the delivery more expeditious and more certain; and secondly, that soon after the transaction of detaining and returning this mail his conduct in this connection was criticised by a republican paper of this city, and he did not care to vindicate himself except through the press, which he did.

As the letters of complaint to which General Walker refers were largely written before he sent this matter in the first instance to the post-office, it strikes the minority that the propriety of sending it by express should have then occurred to him. The minority also think that the very fact that this transaction was being severely commented upon by the press should have created a very strong and sincere desire on the part of General Walker to promptly inform the postmaster here of the facts by which he was so fully vindicated.

The above-recited facts, tending strongly to show that Gibson's statement is true, are supplemented by the evidence of several of the other employés of this committee in which they testify that the fact that matter was being sent out in fraud of the franking privilege, was the subject of frequent conversation among the men employed in the folding and forwarding rooms. We believe Gibson's statement to be true.

THOMAS M. BROWNE,
GEO. D. ROBINSON.

Mr. CONVERSE. I desire to make a suggestion upon the motion that the committee report the testimony to the House and that it be printed, if that motion is entertained by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The views of the minority were submitted with the majority report by unanimous consent, and of course when the House without objection suspended the reading of the majority report, it suspended the reading also of the views of the minority; but both will be printed in the RECORD together.

Mr. BROWNE. That is satisfactory.

Mr. PAGE. I now call for the regular order of business, and I make the point that nothing is in order but the regular order under a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana submits a motion perfectly in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is that the testimony taken by the committee shall be printed and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. BROWNE. I wish I could have the attention of the House for a moment. I desire to modify my motion so far as asking for the printing of the testimony is concerned. It is voluminous. There are many printed exhibits accompanying it; there are some three or four hundred letters. I do not believe the matter is sufficiently important to print. All I desire, therefore, is that the evidence shall be reported to the House and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads so access may be had to it in future Congresses. I want it placed where it may be seen and referred to.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. What is the use of asking to print a report of testimony in the expiring hours of a session to be referred to a committee that goes out at twelve o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. BROWNE. There need not be any controversy about it. I understand it will go on the files anyhow.

Mr. CONVERSE. I object to the motion the gentleman makes. It is not in order. We have fulfilled our duty under this resolution. I will state to the House that there are questions which were investigated by this committee which have not been reduced to writing. There was evidence taken by the committee which has not been reduced to writing. If it is to become the subject of reference and the subject of future critic ism, those facts should be put on paper, and all should go together. That implys time and labor, and some one must be paid to do it.

Mr. BROWNE. I have no earthly objection to that.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I object, then.

Mr. BROWNE. Let me make this suggestion: This testimony is the property of the House. It was taken by one of its committees, by its authority, by its commands, and it must remain on the files of the House.

Mr. CONVERSE. The gentleman is mistaken about it.

Mr. BROWNE. With the gentleman's permission, I am not mistaken about it. It must go on the files of the House; it belongs to the House; it makes no difference whether it was reported and referred to some committee or not. It seems to me monstrous to commission a committee to take testimony on a subject committed to the House and then, after the testimony is taken, stick it in a pigeon-hole or destroy it in some way or other.

Mr. CONVERSE. Why, does not the gentleman know under the resolution the committee were required, not to take and report the testimony but to investigate the subject and report their findings. The committee have investigated and have reported their findings by majority and minority reports. It would be unjust to parties if these papers were to go on record which have been reduced to writing unless the other facts which came before the committee and which were not reduced to writing and upon which the committee have acted were also reduced to writing and put with the other facts and evidence. No one desires to put this in a pigeon-hole. It is not the property of the House; but without any suggestion it was my intention under the rules to have sealed up what evidence and documents we have and placed it in the care of the Clerk of the House, with a statement in relation to certain evidence which was taken orally and which was not reduced to writing; but it is not the right of the gentleman to make this motion, and on that I make the question of order that the gentleman's motion is not in order.

Mr. WILSON. What is the question of order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio raises a question of order.

Mr. BROWNE. A word and I am done. It is assumed by my colleague on the committee that if this testimony were to come into the custody of the House it should have been so stated in the resolution. I apprehend that idea never occurred to anybody. To be sure the resolution required us to investigate and report. We reported conclusions when this might require affirmative action on the part of the House. How can the House determine the propriety of our report unless it has access to the testimony and can inquire through the chairman of the committee as to the accuracy of the statements reported by the committee. I have no thought the chairman intended to pigeon-hole this testimony, and the question occurred to me then, as it does now, if the testimony is not to come into the custody and under the control of the House, where is it to go? What is to become of it, if the House has no right to control it? If it does not come into the House it may go into a pigeon-hole, and there is no impropriety in the remark.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. How could the House control it if it was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, as the gentleman proposes? When that committee expires to-morrow what becomes of it? Is it not as well in a pigeon-hole as in the grave? Who is to blow the horn of Gabriel and resurrect it at the next Congress? Does the gentleman from Indiana propose to come in and play the part of Gabriel, and allow nobody to have any control over it but himself? Let us publish the whole thing. If there is anything wrong on the part of any member of this House in sending documents not entitled to the franking privilege, let us spread it upon the records and let the country see the fact, and condemn the wrong and defend the right.

Mr. PHILIPS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman had not the floor when I rose. I have been trying to get the attention of the Chair to a point of order. I want to make a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. WILSON. But I rose before the gentleman propounded the parliamentary inquiry to the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri is perfectly in order, and will proceed.

Mr. PHILIPS. I rose to say a word as a member of that committee, that if it be the desire of the minority of the committee that the evidence taken should be printed, I trust there will be no objection, for there is certainly nothing in the evidence, so far as the majority is concerned, that we should have any apprehension of or object to seeing in print. And I hope, speaking for myself, that if it is requested, the request will be granted.

But I desire to make a suggestion to my friend from Indiana. He is aware that some matters came to the knowledge of the committee upon which we were agreed without going to the trouble and expense of calling witnesses before us. And if the evidence is to be printed, we ought at least to put so much of that evidence that we agreed upon in writing, in order that it may come in with this report. Otherwise there will be evidence upon which we predicate a conclusion that will not appear in the printed testimony.

Mr. BROWNE. I hope nobody suspects for a moment that in making this motion I have any desire to attack anybody or anything.

Mr. PHILIPS. Certainly not; and I make the suggestion simply for the sake of making the report consistent and harmonious.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. HOUSE. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to desire that this testimony shall be printed?

Mr. BROWNE. No, sir.

Mr. HOUSE. So I understood.

Mr. BROWNE. I withdrew so much of the motion as required the printing. I simply wanted the committee to put the matter in the custody of the House.

Mr. HOUSE. That is right.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the disposition of this report. The report is before the House. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the committee shall submit to the House the testimony and that the report and testimony lie upon the table together to be deposited in the archives of the House.

Mr. BROWNE. I am willing that the motion shall he put in that form.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And in reference to that the gentleman from Ohio raises, as the Chair understands, a point of order.

Mr. CONVERSE. I understand the gentleman's motion did not go so far in the hands of the Clerk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; the gentleman moves that the committee report to the House the testimony taken. Thereafter, the testimony taken and the report, which has been read in part, will go naturally to the table, and there remain unless there is a motion to refer.

Mr. CONVERSE. I would like to ask, now, who is to reduce this testimony to writing.

Mr. BROWNE. Of course no testimony will be reduced to writing. It is not contemplated to print this testimony at all, the motion which I made to that effect having been withdrawn.

Mr. CONVERSE. But there is certain testimony, as the gentleman will remember, which is referred to in the report, and which should be written. That testimony is not now in existence, and it cannot be written in time. If the committee were to sit down and work steadily from this time, they could not reduce it to writing before the expiration of this Congress.

Mr. WILSON. What is the point of order that has been raised?

Mr. CONVERSE. The point of order I have made is that the motion of the gentleman from Indiana is out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from Ohio to raise that point of order.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio why the testimony in this investigation was not reduced to writing?

Mr. CONVERSE. A good deal of testimony was taken orally, some given by members of the House, and by consent of all the members of the committee was received without the oath being administered. Some was taken from memoranda, notes, and letters. There are now in the possession of the committee between three and four hundred political letters that came to the democratic committee. That by itself would fill one volume if it was to be printed. These letters were submitted to the committee; and I do not know whether there is any objection to their being filed or not.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like——

Mr. KEIFER. They are not forged letters, are they?

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio what advantage we derive from this investigation if you have no printed report or testimony?

Mr. CONVERSE. We were directed to make an investigation into certain matters alleged to exist, and report the findings. We have made that investigation, and our findings are submitted.

Mr. DUNNELL. I insist that in an investigation made by any committee of this House, it is not sufficient simply to make a report, but the report is always accompanied with the evidence.

Now, I insist that this report is a defective one, in that it simply states results and findings without giving us all the evidence that was obtained in the investigation.

Mr. PHILIPS. I would like to state for the information of the gentleman from Minnesota that we did have a shorthand reporter who took down the evidence of all the witnesses examined.

Mr. DUNNELL. But the gentleman from Ohio says a part of it was taken orally.

Mr. PHILIPS. There were some matters which came to the knowledge of the committee about which there was no disagreement; and merely to save time, trouble, and expense, as I understood, it was agreed those matters might go in by consent in that form. And my suggestion was that when the written evidence was put in, that also should go along with it in a form to be agreed upon by the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. I did not design to say anything, although I was a member of the committee. But I think now I ought to say something, because it seems to me the House would get a very wrong impression from the way this debate is going; and I believe we can have it right in a moment if gentlemen will listen.

This committee was charged with investigating certain matters connected with an alleged abuse of the franking privilege. Certain reports had appeared in the newspapers which attracted a great deal of attention, and names of members of this House and of the Senate were brought into public notice. The committee proceeded to investigate the charges and took a great deal of testimony that has been committed to writing. A portion of the testimony and facts submitted to the committee has not been reduced to writing because the committee found that although on certain points they could take the statements of members of the House and of the Senate informally, the members of the committee themselves also being possessed of certain knowledge bearing on the finding of the committee, it was not necessary that should be committed to writing at all.

Now I submit that the committee is but the agent of the House. This testimony does not belong to the chairman of the committee. He does not own it, and he does not claim any property in it; and it does not belong to the other four members of the committee. It is the property of the House of Representatives of the United States, and belongs to that House, and nobody has a right to withhold it. Why do we linger at the threshold for a moment talking about instructions to deliver it to the Clerk? No member and no committee has a right to fail of that duty, as I understand it. It should go on the files of the House at once. Nobody wants to have it printed; there is not enough of consequence in that testimony to have it printed. If gentlemen will read the finding of the committee and the opposition views of the minority, they will have all there is of it. Nobody will trouble himself after this Congress expires to read that abundance of testimony which has been taken.

I hope my friend from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] will withdraw his point of order, which I do not think is good for anything, because we have a right to put in that testimony as our first duty. Let it go. There is nothing to keep back at all. The testimony does not reflect on the members of the House or the Senate in any way. Everybody is cleared from any sort of imputation about it. There were certain irregularities in one way, and gentlemen of the majority find others; but these were on the part of persons outside of Congress.

Mr. CONVERSE. That is exactly what I said to my colleague on the other side of the House, the gentleman from Indiana. It was my intention to hand the testimony over to the Clerk in the ordinary way without a motion or instructions in any form on the part of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let it drop. That is the best thing we can do, and let us go on with other business.

Mr. BROWNE. I withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] that as he has modified his motion and does not ask to have the testimony printed, his motion is really unnecessary, as the thirty-eighth rule of the House provides that the testimony shall be delivered to the Clerk of the House.

HOMESTEAD SETTLERS.

Mr. CONVERSE. I rise to make a privileged report. I present a report from a conference committee.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2165) to amend section 2297, title 32 of the Revised Statutes, relating to homestead settlers, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments to the bill, and agree to the same.

GEORGE L. CONVERSE,
HENRY POEHLER,
W. D. WASHBURN,
Managers on the part of the House.
J. D. WALKER,
NEWTON BOOTH,
P. B. PLUMB,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CONVERSE. I will state to the House, in a word or two, the effect of this report. The original bill gave the homesteaders one year after making the entry, during which they might move on the land. The Senate struck that out and put in a proviso that that might be done with the consent of the Commissioner of the Land Office wherever there were climatic reasons for doing so. In those northern regions where the winters are very severe, settlers are sometimes, I believe, not able to go on there immediately after making their entries. This bill is in their interest, and it is right.

The question being taken on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, the Speaker pro tempore, on a viva voce vote, stated that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 10.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. No quorum.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] will not insist upon that point.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I have made the point because I believe these so-called settlers are merely speculators.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order being made, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. CONVERSE, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. VAN VOORHIS.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. At the request of many members I will now withdraw the point of order.

No further count being called for, the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

Mr. KING. I rise to make a privileged report.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. KING. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Interoceanic Ship Canal.

Mr. VALENTINE. What has become of the report of the committee of conference made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CONVERSE?]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been adopted.

Mr. VALENTINE. Was the point of order withdrawn upon it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was.

Mr. VALENTINE. I would like to renew it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late to do that.

Mr. KING. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Interoceanic Ship Canal, and move that it be placed on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman state what is the report, so that the Chair may be advised whether it is privileged or not?

Mr. KING. It is a report from the Committee on Interoceanic Ship Canal on House joint resolution No. 236, in relation to the Monroe doctrine.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] that the House is now acting under a suspension of the rules, and the gentleman has no right to make even a privileged report except by unanimous consent.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. PAGE. I object. I want to go on with the regular business.

ANNA I. GUEST.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being called for, the question is upon ordering to a third reading Senate bill No. 972, granting a pension to Mrs. Anna I. Guest.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I ask that that bill be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be again read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Anna I. Guest, widow of John Guest, late commodore in the United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. HOOKER. I call for the reading of the report.

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 972) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Anna I. Guest, have examined the same, and report:

"That Commodore John Guest, the late husband of the applicant, enlisted in the Navy in the year 1837, and served with distinction in the war with Mexico. He was with Commodore Perry in the Japan expedition, rendering gallant service, and assisted in laying the first cable across the Atlantic. He participated in a large number of naval engagements during the war of the rebellion, and displayed great courage therein. In January, 1879, while in command at the navy-yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, he died of Bright's disease, which his surgeons say was contracted in the line of duty. In view of his long and distinguished services, the committee recommend that the bill pass.

The question was upon ordering the bill to a third reading.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Would it be in order for me now to move to interrupt the present proceedings and ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of House bill No. 5084, appropriating $50,000 for the construction of a public building in the town of Owensborough, Kentucky? [Laughter.]

I desire to say in this connection that I have done more gratuitously hard work for other people on the floor of this House than any other man who is a member of it. Of fifty-odd reports which have been made recommending the construction of public buildings all over this country, I have been one of the sub-committee that has undertaken all the labor, and while I have assisted other gentlemen in passing bills for their special sections, I have been utterly unable to gain the attention of the House for a single moment to call up a bill which I myself have at heart.

Now I desire to ask unanimous consent of this House to take up and pass the bill I have indicated. I will deem it a special favor if the House will permit me to call up that bill and have it passed by the House at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. WARNER. Let the bill be read.

Mr. CLYMER. I shall object, unless the gentleman from Kentucky will pledge himself to call the previous question on the bill.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I will pledge myself to call anything you want. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER. And further, that he will oblige himself that it shall not leave the House until after the adjournment.

Mr. VALENTINE. I object, and call for the regular order.

Mr. BELFORD. I hope the bill will be passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being called for, the consideration of the Senate bill which has been read will now be proceeded with.

Mr. VALENTINE. I have a bill in my hand which has passed the Senate; and if the House will act upon it it will become a law. I asked consent to have it taken up and passed, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCKENZIE] objected. Now that gentleman asks the House to pass a House bill which he must know cannot become a law, for there is not time for the Senate to act upon it.

Mr. HUMPHREY, I reported ten of these bills two years ago, and I would like to know where they are.

Mr. WHITE. I call for the regular order.

MRS. ANNA I. GUEST.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 972) granting a pension to Mrs. Anna I. Guest.

Mr. STEVENSON. I trust there will be no objection to the bill of the gentleman from Kentucky after this is disposed of.

Mr. CLYMER. The regular order has been demanded.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 73, noes 19.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move a call of the House, as the last vote shows no quorum.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is now dividing. No quorum having voted, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SINGLETON, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BAYNE.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 102, noes not counted.

So the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the confusion prevailing in the Hall, the Chair did not hear the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] withdraw his objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MCKENZIE,] but is informed now that he did so.

Mr. VALENTINE. I can be more magnanimous than was my friend from Kentucky when I appealed to him this morning to withdraw an objection. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BRIGGS. I renew the objection.

LUMAN CASE.

The next Senate pension bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1114) granting a pension to Luman Case; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Luman Case.

Mr. WARNER. Is there a report accompanying this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is not, and none is necessary as the bill is a Senate bill.

Mr. CLYMER. Then some one ought to explain the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill,

The SPEAKER pro tempore said: The ayes appear to prevail.

Mr. WARNER and Mr. CLYMER called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope we shall not have the yeas and nays. There is a conference report ready to be presented in a few minutes.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 18, noes 90—less than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. BERRY. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, (amid great confusion.) I demand to have the vote announced. That is the right of every member.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will come to order, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SINGLETON] will be good enough to state his request again.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. WILSON. I hold in my hand two reports from the Committee on Printing which relate to the printing of documents that are valuable to the House and to the country. I have no personal interest in these matters; but I desire to discharge my duty. I have been seeking an opportunity for some time to present these reports. I now send them to the desk. One is a substitute for House joint resolution No. 375, and provides for printing 15,000 copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the statistics of the annual production of gold and silver in the United States. The other is a resolution to print for distribution by the War Department 10,000 copies of the annual report of the Chief Signal Officer for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to present two reports from the Committee on Printing. Is there objection?

Objection was made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KING. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] has withdrawn his objection, and I hope the House will give unanimous consent that I may present a report from the Interoceanic Ship Canal Committee, to go upon the Calendar and be printed. In these expiring hours of the session I fear there will be no other opportunity.

Mr. BROWNE. What is the report?

Mr. KING. It is a report in relation to the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I would like to know what the decision of the Chair was upon the last vote. No quorum voted, and I insist on my right to make the point. The Chair did not announce his decision.

Mr. WHITE. I move a recess for ten minutes.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I insist on my point of order. I have a right to have the decision of the Chair announced.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 365) for the relief of Hardie Hogan Helper;

A bill (H. R. No. 1650) for the relief of Edward T. Brownell;

A bill (H. R. No. 4438) for the relief of William Redus;

A bill (H. R. No. 4905) to declare the true intent and meaning of "An act to reimburse the State of Kentucky for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion, approved June 8, 1872;"

A bill (H. R. No. 5521) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and acts amendatory thereof;

A bill (H. R. No. 6034) for the relief of George W. Henderlite, deceased;

A bill (H. R. No. 6478) for the relief of Levi Price; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6860) for the relief of William H. Davis.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois is rising to a point of order. He will state it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. My point of order is that the vote was not announced on the last bill. There was no quorum, and I made the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois, and he hopes he will accept his word for it, that he did announce the vote, although the gentleman from Illinois may not have heard it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I made the point of order that there was no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. The Chair will believe and will take my word for it that I labored under the same difficulty the Chair did when I did not hear him, and I hope the Chair will preserve order in the House so we can hear each other hereafter. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I ask the attention of the Chair for a single moment. I have not bothered you much, and I trust there will be no objection.

Mr. HOOKER. What is the ruling on the point of order?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. The Chair has not ruled on it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have a resolve in reference to the Society of the Army of the Cumberland, which will take but a single moment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced the adoption of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

It further announced the adoption of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes.

It further announced the adoption of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2165) to amend section 2297 of title 32 of the Revised Statutes, relating to homestead settlers.

It further announced the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4206) confirming and vesting the title to a certain tract of land in Burlington, Iowa, in the independent school district of said State.

COURT OF PENSIONS.

Mr. HOSTETLER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print remarks on the bill (H. R. No. 5394) to establish a court of pensions. [See Appendix.]

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to submit a conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill. The report is identical with the one already communicated to the House on this bill, with a few differences. In accordance with the views of the House the appropriation in reference to the Jeannette is agreed to. The Senate conferees agreed to recede in reference to the appropriation for the pay of the annual employés of the House for thirty days. I will send up an additional statement which covers it. I do not ask for the reading of the report unless some gentleman desires it. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The Clerk read as follows:

The effect of the foregoing report will be, if adopted by the two Houses, in addition to the effect already explained in the detailed statement submitted by the conferees in the report disagreed to by the Houses, as follows:

On amendment 64, inserts the following: "To enable the Secretary of the Navy to immediately charter or purchase, equip, and supply a vessel for the prosecution of a search for the steamer Jeannette of the arctic exploring expedition, (which the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to undertake,) and such other vessels as may be found to need assistance during said cruise, $175,000: Provided, That said vessel shall be wholly manned by volunteers from the Navy."

On amendment 106, inserts the following: "To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to the officers and employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual roll on the 1st day of July, 1880, one month's extra pay at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available."

JAMES H. BLOUNT,
JOHN A. McMAHON,
JAMES MONROE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

The report was adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House No. 7251, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officer of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June, 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes, having met after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 9, 10, 11, 14, 17, 18, 22, 23, 24, 39, 40, 59, 60, 64, 75, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, and 84.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 12, 13, 15, 19, 21, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 62, 63, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 76, and 78, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert "for the legislative expenses of the Territory of Arizona, $6,150;" and Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$600,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$100,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$30,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$330,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$150,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Add at the close of said amendment, as a new paragraph, the following: "To pay Edward F. Riggs for services in the stationery-room from and including November 10, 1880, to March 4, 1881, $276;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 77, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$400,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

J. A. McMAHON,
FRANK HISCOCK,
THOMAS R. COBB,
Managers on the part of the House.
WILLIAM A. WALLACE,
NEWTON BOOTH,
H. G. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Speaker, the deficiency bill passed the Senate to-day, and the sub-committee of the Committee on Appropriations were deprived of course of the publication of the views of the Senate in connection with that bill, and they were also deprived of seeing in print some of the amendments which were incorporated in the Senate. I will state now, for the benefit of gentlemen who desire to know what we have done exactly, the condition of the bill as it comes from the conference committee. We have added $100,000 for the internal-revenue service in one branch and $25,000 in another. We have added $100,000 for the Printing Department of the Government, so as to make the total appropriation for that service for the current year $2,000,000. The Senate put an amendment upon the bill involving an expenditure of $275,000 for the Bureau of Construction and Repair and for the Bureau of Steam Engineering in the Navy Department. We finally agreed upon the sum of $150,000 for that purpose, reducing thus the total amount of the amendment of the Senate by $125,000.

The Senate put in various provisions, amounting in the aggregate to $175,000, for the benefit of the Ponca Indians, and as this clause had been recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs in the Senate——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a moment to receive a message from the Senate?

Mr. McMAHON. Certainly.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. R. No. 164) relative to the salaries of Government employés in the District of Columbia; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. McMAHON. The provision in regard to the Miami Indians for a sum of money due them last July under a treaty, which was put in the deficiency bill by the House this year and had been put in the deficiency bill last year, was retained, the Senate receding from its disagreement.

In regard to public buildings, we increased the appropriation $10,000 for the heating, hoisting, and ventilating apparatus. We increased the appropriation for the furniture for public buildings $10,000; and we adopted the amendment of the Senate increasing the appropriation for fuel, light, and water, $5,000.

I will state to the House, Mr. Speaker, that quite a number of claims were put in by the Senate upon full investigation by them, as we were given to understand, which, however, we had not time to examine and could not examine, most of which have been left in. If there is any point upon which any gentleman desires any information I am ready to give it as far as I can.

Mr. KENNA. I hope the House will at once vote on the report?

Mr. DUNNELL. Can the gentleman from Ohio state what is the total increase upon the amount in the bill as it left the House of Representatives?

Mr. McMAHON. I am unable to state precisely the total increase. I can state, however, that the net reduction upon the amendments placed on the bill by the Senate amounts to $380,319. The bill appropriates somewhere between four and five millions of dollars.

If no gentleman has any question to put, I move the previous question upon concurrence.

Mr. ATKINS. How much did the Senate increase the bill?

Mr. McMAHON. I think about a million of dollars.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. McMAHON moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the objection to printing the report presented by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] from the Interoceanic Ship Canal Committee on the Monroe doctrine is withdrawn. Is there any further objection?

There was no objection, and the motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PRICE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] that the House take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 102, noes 20.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers; and appoints the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SINGLETON, and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. PRICE.

Mr. HUNTON. I believe there will be no objection to a recess if gentlemen will withdraw their objection to the little bill which I desire to have passed at this time.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If there is an opportunity to consider some other little bills I will not object; otherwise, I must.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 115, noes 6.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will retain their places.

The count was resumed, and the tellers reported—ayes 118, noes 9.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I withdraw the call for further count.

The SPEAKER. The point as to a quorum is withdrawn.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Pending the announcement of the result of the vote,

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 182) granting a pension to Mary A. Shemelia; and

A bill (S. No. 465) granting an increase of pension to George Smith.

PAY OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS ON HOLIDAYS.

Mr. McKENZIE. I withdraw the objection I made to-day to the consideration of the Senate resolution in reference to the pay of employés of the Government in the District of Columbia.

There being no further objection the Senate joint resolution (S. R. No. 164) relating to salaries of Government employés in the District of Columbia was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That all employés of the Government in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, shall be paid for the 4th day of March, inauguration day, and the 30th day of May, decoration day, 1881, as on other days on which they perform labor.

Mr. WARNER. I do not think that is right.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, do not object to that.

Mr. ATKINS. It applies only to the employés in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. HUNTON. And in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the following cases, there being no adverse report thereon:

To Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania, the pension papers of John Ryon, reports having been made but no further action taken thereon;

To Mr. FORD, papers from the Committee on War Claims submitted by him in connection with House bill No. 1702 for the relief of N. B. Giddings;

To Mr. GILLETTE, papers in the pension case of Clementina Bickford, not acted upon by the Pensions Committee;

To Mr. BINGHAM, papers in the case of William H. Stricker; and

To Mr. BARBER, papers in the case of J. B. Braun.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT PARIS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a statement of expenditures on account of the international exhibition at Paris; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

NEW MEXICO PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the papers in four New Mexico private land claims; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to present for action at this time a resolution to pay the employés of the House borne on the annual roll their salaries for the month of March on Monday, March 7, or as soon thereafter as possible.

Mr. TALBOTT. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the announcement of the vote on the motion to take a recess.

Mr. SPRINGER. There will be no objection to this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. TALBOTT. I only asked what was the regular order.

Mr. WHITE. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the announcement of the vote on the motion that the House take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow. The ayes are 118, and the noes are 9.

Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. HILL. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. It is too late to make that point. The point as to a quorum was withdrawn.

Mr. HILL. I renewed the point that a quorum had not voted.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman who made the point [Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois] withdrew it, and no further objection was made.

Mr. ROBESON. We had tellers to test the question of a quorum, and the member who made the point of order that no quorum had voted withdrew that point by stating that he asked for no further count.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is correct. The Chair will state that if the point of order is now insisted upon no business can be transacted and nothing will be gained.

Mr. HILL. I renewed the point of order.

The SPEAKER. When?

Mr. HILL. Immediately the vote was announced, and all the time, and I now renew it.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will again take their places.

Mr. ROBESON. I protest against that. A quorum appeared by the acknowledgment of the tellers on both sides; the teller on the one side claiming there was a quorum, and the teller on the other side demanding no further count. I say, therefore, that this House is now in recess.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman is mistaken. He does not know what occurred.

Mr. ROBESON. I stood by the tellers and saw and heard what was done.

Mr. HILL. How could you see that, when fifty members were demanding a further count?

Mr. ROBESON. Nobody was demanding it.

Mr. HILL. I was.

Mr. SCALES. When the point of order of a quorum was withdrawn, was it not distinctly stated from the Chair that the call for a quorum was withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. HILL. It was renewed by a half dozen members.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman renew it?

Mr. HILL. I did renew it and I do renew it.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the facts are these: the point was made that there was no quorum voting, and tellers were ordered and took their places. Members passed between the tellers until the one of the tellers who had made the point of order [Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois] was induced to withdraw the point that no quorum had voted. He did withdraw that point, and it was not then renewed, because the Chair immediately asked permission to present some papers.

The SPEAKER. Before the point was renewed as to there being a quorum, the Chair had by the courtesy of the House presented certain executive papers which he desired to have offered. But the Chair takes no advantage. When a member rises and states that immediately after the point of order had been withdrawn by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SINGLETON] he himself renewed it, the Chair feels obligated to recognize it, if he insists upon it.

Mr. HILL. I do not insist upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that if he made the point the Chair did not hear. But the Chair never puts his own hearing or eye-sight against the declaration of a member on the floor.

Mr. ATHERTON. Has not the House some rights in this matter?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HOOKER. How could the point be made until the announcement of the vote?

The SPEAKER. It was well understood what the vote was.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I desire to make a single suggestion only.

Mr. WILSON. If the point that no quorum is present is insisted upon, can the Speaker allow any business at all to be transacted?

The SPEAKER. He cannot.

Mr. WILSON. Then I hope the point of order will be withdrawn.

Mr. WHITE. As there appears to be no quorum, I move a call of the House.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I ask the Speaker to submit to the House whether or not the gentleman raised the point in time. Nobody heard him, and I think the House ought to decide upon it.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion for a call of the House.

The question was taken, and more than fifteen members voted in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. A call of the House is ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. ATHERTON. I hope the point of order will be withdrawn. I give notice that if it is insisted upon no business can be transacted by the House until a quorum appears.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Aiken,	De La Matyr,	Lindsey,	Russell, Daniel L.
Armfield,	Deering,	Loring,	Russell, W. A.

The SPEAKER. The call of the roll shows the presence of 131 members. The doors will now be closed.

Mr. HILL. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. I now move that the House take a recess until ten o'clock a. m.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at two o'clock and fifty-five minutes a. m., Friday, March 4) the House took a recess until ten o'clock a. m.

MORNING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at ten o'clock a. m. Friday, March 4) resumed its session.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 972) granting a pension to Mrs. Anna I. Guest;

A bill (S. No. 1114) granting a pension to Luman Case;

A bill (H. R. No. 4206) confirming and vesting the title to a certain tract of land in Burlington, Iowa, in the "independent school district" of said city;

A bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury, in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 141) authorizing the President to place Thomas L. Crittenden on the retired list with the rank and pay of brigadier-general.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4050) to divide the State of Louisiana into two judicial districts. It has been returned from the Senate with an amendment in the form of a substitute. I ask that the amendment be taken up and concurred in. It proposes simply to give a court to a part of the country which needs provision of that kind. The measure has received the unanimous indorsement of both branches of Congress. I beg that as a matter of public relief the bill may be taken up and the amendment concurred in.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not at the desk. As soon as it is found the Chair will again present the matter to the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BREWER. While that bill is being found I desire to be recognized——

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Pending that I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of putting upon its passage joint resolution (H. R. No. 403) providing for testing an automatic recording apparatus.

PAY OF HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, from the Committee on Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the employés of the House the compensation that may be due them, respectively, for the month of March, 1881, on Saturday, the 5th day of the month.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. McCOOK. Before the regular order proceeds, I wish to be recognized upon a matter to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCOOK] will be recognized. I am sure there will be no objection to his proposition.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. There could not be any objection to mine. [Renewed cries of "Regular order!"]

CHARLES H. FRANK.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the next Senate pension bill on the Speaker's table.

The bill (S. No. 1334) for the relief of Charles H. Frank was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

The question being on ordering the bill to a third reading, it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Charles H. Frank to $50 a month to date from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. WARNER. Is there any report accompanying this bill? It is a bill which I think needs to be debated before it is acted on.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1334) granting a pension to Charles H. Frank, have carefully examined the same, and report as follows:

It appears from the evidence on file in the case that the petitioner was a private in Company H, Third Delaware Volunteers; enlisted March 3, 1862; discharged May 28, 1863; and filed declaration for pension June 3, 1863.

Pension was granted at $4 per month, which has been since increased to $18 per month.

The petitioner claims to have been injured on the retreat to Harper's Ferry. He fell down in crossing a ditch, and was injured in the spine by being trod upon by a comrade.

The reports from the Adjutant-General's office and hospital reports confirm fully the statement of the petitioner, and it is further verified by a large number of witnesses.

He claims his disability to be total and permanent.

Drs. Reyburn and Stanton examined the petitioner on November 17, 1879, and report him thus: "He is now in a condition to warrant a rating of second grade, as he is wholly unable to do any manual labor."

The medical referee upon the report presented disagrees with the conclusions of the board, and thereupon the Pension Office rejected the application for increase.

The petitioner has an aged mother and sister dependent upon him for support, and he is entirely disabled from contributing to their support, but, on the contrary, has been a burden upon them by reason of the injury he received in the service. His disability seems to be increasing, and is without doubt continuous, as shown by reports of medical officers.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment.

Mr. WARNER. I desire to say that on a previous day when unanimous consent was asked for the passage of this bill I interposed an objection. I will yield now, if it be in order, to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. KING,] so that his bill may be taken up.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I insist on this pension bill being considered now.

Mr. KING. Let my bill pass. The House has already given unanimous consent for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The House gave consent for the consideration of the bill of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. KING,] which has now been found. Its consideration was interrupted by the fact that the bill was not then at the desk.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN LOUISIANA.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4050) to divide the State of Louisiana into two judicial districts, the pending question being upon concurrence in an amendment of the Senate which was read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the parishes of Caddo, Bossier, Webster, Claiborne, Union, Morehouse, West Carroll, East Carroll, Madison, Richland, Ouachita, Lincoln, Bienville, Red River, De Soto, Sabine, Winn, Natchitoches, Jackson, Caldwell, Franklin, Tensas, Concordia, Catahoula, Grant, Vernon, Rapides, Avoyelles, Saint Landry, La Fayette, Saint Martin's, Vermillion, Cameron, and Calcasieu, in the State of Louisiana, shall constitute, and is hereby created, the western judicial district in that State; and the district court now existing in Louisiana shall, from and after the passage of this act, be known as the district court for the eastern district of Louisiana, and all the parishes in said State not above named shall belong to said district.

SEC. 2. That all suits not of a local nature in the circuit and district courts against a single defendant, inhabitant of said State, must be brought in the district where he resides, but if there are two or more defendants, residing in different districts, such suits may be brought in either district.

SEC. 3. That all prosecutions for crimes or offenses hereafter committed in either of said districts shall be cognizable within said district; and all prosecutions for crimes or offenses heretofore committed in the district of Louisiana shall be commenced and proceeded with as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 4. That all civil suits in law or equity which have arisen in the parishes composing said western district, or against persons residing therein, or concerning lands situated therein, and now pending, together with all process, writs, recognizances, and records belonging thereto, shall, with the consent of all the parties, be transferred to said western district.

SEC. 5. That there shall be held semi-annually in said district two stated sessions of the district and circuit courts, at each of the following places, to wit: At Opelousas, on the first Mondays of January and June; at Alexandria, on the fourth Mondays of January and June; at Shreveport, on the third Mondays of February and July; at Monroe, on the first Mondays of April and October.

SEC. 6. That a person learned in the law shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, district judge thereof, with a salary of $3,500 per annum, payable quarterly, and with the same powers and duties of the district judge of the United States for the district of Louisiana as it now exists, and such as are conferred on him, or required of him, by this act. And the said judge shall appoint a clerk of the district court in the western district, and a clerk of the circuit court for said district shall be appointed in the same manner as other such clerks are appointed, and who shall receive for the services performed by them the same fees and compensation that are allowed to the clerks of such courts holding their sessions in New Orleans, in the same State, and shall be subject in every respect to the same restrictions and responsibilities; and the district and circuit courts for the eastern district of Louisiana shall be held in New Orleans, as heretofore. And it shall be the duty of the clerks of the district and circuit courts of the United States in New Orleans, whenever the courts shall so order, to transmit, by some safe conveyance, or to deliver to the clerks of the courts in the western district, or their order, the original papers in all such cases as properly belong to the court in the western district by the provisions of this act, together with a transcript of the proceedings had therein.

SEC. 7. That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint one person as marshal and one as district attorney for the said western district of the United States within the State of Louisiana created by this act; and that the terms of appointment and service, together with the duties and responsibilities of the said marshal and district attorney, respectively, for the district aforesaid shall be in all respects the same within their said district as the terms of appointment and services, the duties, and responsibilities of the marshal and district attorney, respectively, of the eastern district of the State of Louisiana.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. KING moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BREWER. I wish to make one request.

Mr. WARNER. Let us first dispose of the bill under consideration. Then there will be opportunity for the gentleman from Michigan and other gentlemen.

Mr. BREWER. I am about to retire from Congress. Here is a bill which has passed the Senate unanimously. It does not take one cent from the Treasury. I hope it will be taken up and passed.

Mr. WARNER. I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] provided his measure does not displace the pension bill now pending.

Mr. HATCH. I call for the regular order. I object to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] yielding to one member and calling the regular order against everybody else.

Mr. COX. I move that the House take a recess until eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERS.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On coming to the Capitol this morning I was stopped at the Senate entrance by men dressed in military attire, with arms in their hands, who refused me admittance. I stated I was a member of this House. They then admitted me. I suppose it is too late to inquire by what authority a military in place of a civil force is placed at the doors of this Capitol to restrain members from entering; and I wish to call the attention of the Speaker and this House and of the country to the fact.

Mr. BARBER. When you elect your own man next time, then you can have any sort of a guard there you please, if you object to this one.

Mr. VALENTINE. I was not restrained, and I came through the guard.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I call the attention of the House and the country to the fact. It is a proper thing for Congress to take cognizance of, and such an outrage should not be allowed to go uncensured.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to take a recess until eleven o'clock.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I wish to inquire if the House takes a recess until eleven o'clock to-day, when it will assemble again. The motion for a recess will carry us beyond the legislative day.

The SPEAKER. That question has been already overruled in another form.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 49.

Mr. COX. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The question of order being raised that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. BREWER and Mr. COX were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported 42 members voting in the affirmative, noes not counted.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The motion for a recess is disagreed to.

JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 164) relating to salaries of Government employés in the District of Columbia; when the Speaker signed the same.

PRODUCTION OF PRECIOUS METALS.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I have two privileged reports to submit from the Committee on Printing, and if they cannot be received and acted upon at this time, I hope the Clerk will take charge of them. They are for printing public documents for the use of members of Congress.

Mr. BREWER. I want to have recognition to take up a Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized for a privileged report.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Printing, reported, as a substitute for House resolution No. 375, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 419) for the printing of the report of the Director of the Mint on the annual production of gold and silver in the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that 15,000 copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the annual production of gold and silver in the United States be printed; 8,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, 3,000 for the use of the Senate, and 4,000 for the use of the Treasury Department.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANNUAL REPORT OF SIGNAL OFFICER.

Mr. WILSON also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably the concurrent resolution that there be printed for distribution by the War Department 10,000 extra copies of the annual report of the Chief Signal Officer for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FILING REPORTS, ETC.

Mr. TUCKER. I submit the following order, which I hope will be adopted by unanimous consent.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That committees be authorized to file with the Clerk any reports authorized to be made by such committee for printing and proper reference.

Mr. CARLISLE. Does that include the views of the minority as well as the report of the majority? We have a report to make on a privileged matter, and the minority ought to have an opportunity to present their views.

The SPEAKER. This is the usual resolution, and the Chair thinks it would include the views of the minority.

Mr. WARNER. Let it be amended to include the views of the minority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

The order, as amended, was adopted.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, asking for the return of Senate resolution in relation to continuing the Joint Select Committee on additional accommodations for the Library of Congress during the recess of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to granting the request of the Senate?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PENSION LAWS, ETC.

Mr. STEVENSON, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print in the RECORD remarks upon the pension laws and remarks upon California land grants. [See Appendix.]

JOHN SHARP.

On motion of Mr. COFFROTH, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of John Sharp.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT FORT BENTON.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a memorial of the Legislature of Dakota, concerning the erection of a custom-house at Fort Benton; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a memorial of the Legislature of Dakota, concerning Indian reservations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

TERRITORIAL OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a joint resolution of the Legislature of Dakota, relating to the appointment and election of United States and territorial officers in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories.

PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERS.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask that it be read for the information of the House.

Mr. BROWNE. What is the question of privilege?

Mr. HUTCHINS. It relates to the armed guard stationed around the building to obstruct the entrance of members.

Mr. BROWNE. Is that a question of privilege?

Mr. HUTCHINS. I claim it is a question of the highest privilege.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas members of this House have this day been refused admission to the Capitol of the United States by an armed military force:

Resolved, That this breach of the parliamentary and constitutional privilege of the members of this House in going to and returning from the same meets its severest censure.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move the adoption of the resolution, but will yield if I am allowed to do so for a few minutes to gentlemen who may wish to say a word in connection with this matter.

Mr. BARBER. Who stopped the gentleman? Did he not get in?

Mr. WARNER. This is not a light matter, and it ought to have the consideration of the House. Bayonets ought never to be crossed to prevent the entrance of members of this body. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HUTCHINS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. FROST.]

Mr. FROST. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that this is a question of the highest privilege.

Mr. BROWNE. Is this debate in order?

The SPEAKER. If any member of the House was obstructed or prevented from entering, the Chair thinks it would be a question of privilege.

Mr. PRICE. I want to say a word about this matter myself. I was stopped at the door——

Mr. FROST. I have the floor. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BARBER. I have been obstructed for more than a year trying to get recognition here for public matters.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri will proceed without interruption.

Mr. FROST. I maintain that the question presented to us here by the resolution of the gentleman from New York is one of the very highest character of privilege.

I do not wish to make a mountain out of a mole-hill, but I insist that this, which may be harmless in itself at present, may present in the future a precedent of the most dangerous character to the liberties of this people. The time may come, I do not anticipate that it will, but it is possible that in the future it may come, when that which now passes without notice may be set up as a precedent, and a dangerous example, and one set by a democratic Senate and democratic House for the purpose of trampling upon the liberties and rights of both of those bodies. It is our duty to guard against such a contingency.

Mr. Speaker, if we permit this act to go unrebuked we give our assent to a precedent that may be used to overthrow the rights of this body in the future. We have had instances in the past, not only in this country, but in that country from which we have derived our parliamentary laws and our parliamentary institutions, and it is a well-known historical fact that at a not very distant period armed troops were stationed at the doors of legislative assemblies and passes were demanded from each of the members duly elected to those bodies without which they could not obtain admission.

It is because we do not wish to set such a precedent here and give our assent to a proceeding of such dangerous character, or permit it to be established with the sanction of a democratic Congress, that the resolution of the gentleman from New York is offered, and I hope will be immediately adopted without dissent.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman need not worry about the matter. Nobody is going to follow a democratic precedent.

Mr. WARNER. We do not propose to have one of such a character as that set. Gentleman may make light of this, but it is a matter that demands attention. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. PRICE. I would like to have a word upon this question, if I can be in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will listen to the gentleman if he can do so. The gentleman from New York now has the floor.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I yield one minute of my time to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BROWNE. I rise to a parliamenary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE. I want to know how long the gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I only ask five minutes. I do not know how much time I may be entitled to under the rule, but five minutes will be ample, I imagine.

Mr. KEIFER. We would like to have a few minutes to show the country who is responsible.

Mr. BROWNE. Is this a privileged resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if a member is obstructed in his entrance to this Hall it presents a question of privilege.

Mr. CARLISLE. I would like to have the resolution which has been reported read again.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. BARBER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARBER. I want to ask if the gentleman did not say when he announced the fact to the guard that he was a member of this House, that he was permitted to pass unmolested?

Mr. HUTCHINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARBER. Then what more do you want?

Mr. HUTCHINS. I want to know by what authority such an outrage upon the privileges of members, the representatives of the people, is permitted.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the democratic Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate——

Mr. BERRY. I had to exhibit a pass before I could come in.

Mr. BROWNE. Before I could get in I had to exhibit a commission signed by a democratic governor. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER. You did not have to present it before armed soldiers.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Is a democratic House and a democratic Senate using the bayonet upon their own members?

Mr. WARNER. I want to find out who is using it, and by what authority.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATKINS. The point of order I make is this—and if gentlemen will observe it there will be no more confusion—that every member of this House who desires to speak shall first address the Speaker.

If gentlemen keep on talking to each other we get into a state of utter confusion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order; and hereafter gentlemen who desire to speak shall address the Chair.

Mr. CARLISLE. Let the resolution be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas members of this House have this day been refused admission to the Capitol of the nation by an armed military force:

Resolved, That this breach of the parliamentary and constitutional privilege of the members of this House in going to and returning from the same meets its severest censure.

Mr. CONGER. That should be changed to "militia force." These gentlemen that are here in uniform are militia from the different States.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Has the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] has the floor.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I yield to the gentleman from California, [Mr. BERRY.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have order.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, being a young member, this being the first term I have served in Congress, when I was called to a halt in coming to the Capitol of the nation this morning by armed men dressed in blue—[derisive laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. BAKER. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Blue is a good color; don't you like it?

Mr. CONGER. Blue is on duty in the morning; gray will be in the afternoon.

Mr. BERRY. I demand to be heard.

Mr. BARBER. I have risen to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. BERRY] is entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BARBER] will please be seated.

Mr. BARBER. I have risen to make a point of order. I think we ought to try one case at a time. We have the case of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] to dispose of.

The SPEAKER. That is not a point of order. That is merely a mode of getting in a remark out of order.

Mr. BERRY. I rose for the purpose of finding out whether I was prevented from coming into this Capitol by law or not. I was about to say I was a young member, and did not know but on the 4th of March when I attempted to come up to this Capitol that by law I was prevented from entering its portals until I exhibited a pass. Armed soldiers called me to a halt.

Mr. CONGER. May I ask the gentleman by whom the pass is signed?

Mr. BERRY. The pass is signed by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States. [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. CONGER. Yes. Be thankful that you have got a pass.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 4050) to divide the State of Louisiana into two judicial districts.

PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. BERRY] is on the floor.

Mr. VALENTINE. May I ask the gentleman from California a question?

Mr. BERRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. VALENTINE. At what door were these soldiers stationed? At the door of the House or of the Senate?

Mr. BERRY. I did not find them at the door; I found them surrounding the building.

Mr. VALENTINE. At the House wing or the Senate wing?

Mr. BERRY. Beyond both, and beyond the Senate wing. I told them I was a member of the American Congress and demanded admittance, and I was refused.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BERRY. I demanded admittance by virtue of being a member of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

APPROVAL OF BILLS, ETC.

A message from the President, by Mr. PRUDEN, his Secretary, informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERS.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE.]

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I ask the recognition of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is on the floor.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I have asked recognition. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has not been recognized, and is not in order.

Mr. PRICE. I am very glad to have a minute to speak in order. I want to say to the House that I, too, an old radical republican, was stopped when I was on my way to the Chamber this morning. And I was stopped because those men were there to protect the body from the crowd on the outside; and all we had to say to them was, "Why, I am a member of Congress." And they said, "Well, that is all right; we are here to protect members of Congress, so that they may find admission to the Hall."

Mr. HUTCHINS. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a question of order. I insist that gentlemen shall take their seats. I ask, have we a Sergeant-at-Arms of this House?

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will be seated and the House will come to order. Otherwise the Chair will direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to proceed with the mace.

Mr. ATKINS. If the House will hear me I desire to make one statement.

Mr. COX here took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee will suspend till order is restored. Members will be in order.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield to me.

Mr. ATKINS. I yield to the gentleman.

THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to present a resolution to the House. At this closing hour of the session it is with pleasure I am permitted to offer the following resolution, and ask its acceptance by the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House are due and tendered to Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, the Speaker, for the ability, fairness, and courtesy with which he has presided over its deliberations during the Forty-sixth Congress.

The resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 167) to pay the officers and employés of the Senate borne on the annual roll one month's extra pay.

PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERS.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to state to the House (and I wish the House to hear me) that in policing the doors of this Capitol—by whatever order I do not know—the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House had charge of the western and eastern doors, and he directed that there should be no obstruction to members or anybody else. He therefore is not responsible for any obstruction which members may have encountered.

Mr. WARNER. I desire to know by what authority armed men are stationed about this Capitol at all. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] has said they are here for the protection of members of this House. Has it come to that—that we must have a soldiery about this Capitol to protect its members? I have seen bayonets crossed at the entrance of deliberative assemblies in other countries; but I never expected to see such a thing at the Capitol of this Republic.

Mr. FRYE. I call the gentleman's attention to the military in the galleries. Look at them! [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER. I am glad to see them, but they are not here for our "protection." Whether armed men are placed at the doors of this Capitol, or about it, to prevent entrance or for our protection or for any other purpose I do protest against it, and I concur in every word that has been said by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. FROST.] Can the Speaker inform us by what authority it has been done? Is it by any officer of this House or of either House? I care not whether it is done by the officers of one House or the other, or by any other authority, it should not be passed by unnoticed. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and I will not see the military, whether militia or the regular soldiery, substituted for civil officers without my solemn protest, I care not whether it was done thoughtlessly or otherwise. It is a precedent fraught with danger. The substitution of military force for civil officers in the administration of the civil power has been the beginning of the end of every free government that has had an existence on the face of the earth. Liberty and the armed soldier in the administration of civil law have never stood together and never can. I should like even to see a civic procession on an occasion like this unmarred by the presence of a single bayonet.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I rise to a question of order. There is so much confusion in the Hall that we cannot understand what the gentleman is speaking about.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Nobody can understand till members are seated. Every member will be seated.

Mr. ROBESON. On both sides?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On both sides.

Mr. ROBESON, (rising.) I trust the Chair will enforce its order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] will be seated. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER. It will not do for gentlemen to try to cry down a matter of this kind. However harmless it may be to-day, it is a thing that should be killed at its birth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will be seated, and members will come to order.

Mr. CONGER. We cannot be quiet while there are soldiers in this Hall. The galleries are full of soldiers. It fills us with alarm! [Laughter.]

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen will preserve order, the question presented by this resolution can be disposed of without any excitement or any undue feeling. I have no doubt that these armed men—whether they be militia or soldiers of the regular Army I do not know—have been placed here as a part of the police to preserve order to-day. If any harm has been done let this House, in a calm and dispassionate way, as becomes us, express our opinion concerning it; but let us not make a great sensation in the country over a small matter, which doubtless was not intended to do any harm to anybody. I admit that it is a very bad precedent to station armed men around this Capitol and that it ought not to be tolerated, especially if they have been stationed here for an improper or illegal purpose. If it has been a mere mistake, if they have been placed here to preserve order during the ceremonies which are to take place to-day, I repeat that we ought not to get into a great passion or a high state of excitement about it. But we can express our opinion concerning the proceeding nevertheless, and I am willing to do so.

Mr. WARNER. If there has been a mistake made, let us know it. This may appear to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] "a small matter," but it makes a very bad precedent.

Mr. CARLISLE. I have said so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] holds the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. HUTCHINS. To the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] for one minute.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say but very few words on the resolution now before us, and feel that those words ought to be spoken calmly and in earnestness.

There is no man in this House or country, I am quite sure, who would deprecate more deeply or resent more indignantly than myself any interference on the part of the military with the legitimate functions of the civil authorities. At first blush this would seem to be such case; for it is difficult to present a case more flagrant than that of the members of the highest legislative body known to our laws being compelled to enter the halls of their deliberations through the gleaming ranks of bayonets stationed there to question their entrance.

In this case members state that not only were armed men stationed at or near the approaches to the Capitol, but that they were by them halted and refused admittance except on the presentation of passes, or evidences of authority to enter.

Now, sir, this looks serious, but, calmly considered, what is there in it? What are the facts?

In anticipation of the immense crowd which is now here attending the inauguration the Senate, to guard against intrusion and confusion incident to the exercises to be had in the Senate Chamber, made some regulations or orders (not sufficiently guarded, perhaps) to meet that exigency, and the Sergeant-at-Arms and other officials of that body in carrying into effect those regulations employed, as I am informed, some independent militia who, being armed, were assigned to that duty.

The regular military forces of the Government have had nothing whatever to do with it, neither in command nor execution by officers or men, and are in no wise responsible for any errors or inconveniences that may have arisen from it.

The mistake seems to have been in the employment of these militiamen who were not sufficiently acquainted with the members of Congress.

Whatever responsibility, therefore, may be resting upon anybody belongs to the loose orders of the Senate or the inefficient and ill-guarded execution of them by the Senate officials charged with that duty, and if condemation or censure is to be passed upon any one, it ought to be upon them and not upon the military, for in a proper sense the military have had nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. WARNER. But it is a matter for earnest protest.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. GILLETTE.]

Mr. GILLETTE took the floor.

Mr. ROBESON. I ask the resolution be again reported and I will ask there be order in the House while it is being read.

Mr. McCOOK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be heard.

Mr. BROWNE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. How much time has the gentleman from New York?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He has one hour.

Mr. BROWNE. He has been on the floor about three quarters of an hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will decide that.

Mr. FRYE. Allow the tempest in a tea-pot to go on.

Mr. CONGER. We are acting under a suspension of the rules and I insist that the gentleman from New York is not entitled to the floor, but that the regular order of business is to proceed with the pension bills in their order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not decide the point of order until order is restored in the Hall.

Mr. CONGER. Then the Chair will not decide the point this session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan will state his point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point that the Chair has no right while the House is acting under a suspension of the rules to declare other business in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ATHERTON. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. McCOOK. What is it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan will state his point of order.

Mr. CONGER. My point of order is that we are acting under a suspension of the rules and no other matter can come in by unanimous consent. Therefore, the gentleman has no hour and no minute to talk here.

Mr. ATHERTON. The gentleman is too late with that point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has overruled the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. And I have appealed from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order comes too late, in the first place, and in the next place the resolution was introduced as a question of privilege, parliamentary and constitutional.

Mr. CONGER. I appeal from that decision of the Chair.

Mr. ROBESON. I ask that the resolution be again read.

Mr. ATHERTON. I have moved to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Let us take a recess until half past eleven.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 119, nays 92, not voting 79; as follows:

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. JAMES with Mr. O'BRIEN, until further notice.

Mr. O'CONNOR with Mr. HOUK, both being ill, until further notice.

Mr. HENDERSON with Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois.

Mr. BEALE with Mr. BOYD.

Mr. JOYCE with Mr. BUCKNER.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, moved to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, and others objected.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively for the calling of my name during the roll-call, and was unable to hear it. I do not know whether my vote has been recorded or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CARLISLE.) Did the gentleman vote?

Mr. PAGE. I have just stated that I listened to the calling of my name. The Clerk has passed it. At all events, in the confusion, I have failed to hear it. I ask permission to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot entertain, as the gentleman is aware, a request for unanimous consent under the rules. The gentleman, however, accomplishes his purpose by stating how he would have voted.

Mr. PAGE. I would have voted in the negative.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Mr. Speaker, I now move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me to offer the following.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House (No. 419) to authorize the printing of 15,000 extra copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the statistics of the production of gold and silver in the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the resolution of the House providing for the printing and distribution under the direction of the War Department of 10,000 copies of the report of the Chief Signal Officer.

Also, that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill of the House (No. 3826) for the relief of the heirs of the late Langley B. Culley.

The message further announced that the Senate had appointed a committee of two members, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House, to wait upon the President of the United States to inform him that the two Houses of Congress, having finished their business, were now ready to receive any communication he may have to make prior to an adjournment; and further, that Messrs. SAULSBURY and HOAR had been appointed as such committee on the part of the Senate.

PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERS.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. KNOTT. Then I offer the following as a substitute for the resolution originally reported.

Mr. O'NEILL. What has become of the regular order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is being proceeded with.

Mr. BROWNE. I would like to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution proposed as a substitute by the gentleman from Kentucky will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the placing of an armed force at the doors of this Capitol is without authority of law, a breach of the privileges of this House and a restraint upon the liberty of the citizen which should be condemned; and that the Speaker of this House be, and he is hereby, directed to cause their instant removal from the approaches to this Hall.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I accept the substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky, and demand the previous question.

Mr. BROWNE. I desire to move an amendment to the substitute if I can get an opportunity to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York demands the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I have demanded the previous question.

Mr. WILSON. I ask gentlemen to yield to me in order to make a privileged report by unanimous consent. This is of public importance and necessity.

Several members objected.

Mr. BROWNE. I desire simply to place the responsibility where it belongs.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BROWNE. I insist that it is not fair that gentlemen who have occupied part of an hour on the other side should now move the previous question so as to cut off all debate or amendment on this side. I desire to insert in the amendment, after the word "Capitol," the words "by the democratic Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate." This will put the responsibility in the right place.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the main question.

Mr. CONGER. Where is my motion to lay on the table?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be in order after the main question is ordered.

Mr. CONGER. The rule says it may be before or after.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question was demanded first, and if ordered it does not preclude the gentleman having a vote upon his motion.

Mr. CONGER. But when the motion to lay on the table was made the previous question had not been ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It had been demanded, the Chair is aware.

Mr. CONGER. But not ordered. I prefer to have a vote on my motion first.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think the gentleman from Michigan is entitled to have a vote on his motion pending the demand for the previous question under the new rules. The question is on laying the resolution and proposed substitute on the table.

Mr. BLACKBURN. On that I demand the yeas and nays to save time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT UPON THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before the vote is taken, the Chair would like to appoint the usual committee to wait upon the President in conjunction with the Senate committee, to inform him that the two Houses are ready to adjourn, and to receive from him any communication he may have to make.

The following committee on the part of the House was appointed: Mr. TUCKER, Mr. GEDDES, and Mr. ROBESON.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution and bill of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint Resolution (H. R. No. 419) to print 15,000 copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the statistics of the annual production of gold and silver in the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3826) for the relief of the heirs of the late Langley B. Culley.

PRIVILEGE OF MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the motion to lay on the table the substitute for the proposed resolution. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 99, nays 120, not voting 71; as follows:

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

After the second roll-call,

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, said: I move to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan, that owing to the lapse of time no further action will be had on this matter.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that unanimous consent be given to that effect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] that no further action will be sought under the circumstances.

Mr. CONGER. Let unanimous consent be asked.

Mr. WARNER. I hope the resolution may be put upon its passage without the yeas and nays.

Mr. ERRETT. No, no.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the regular order is demanded the Clerk will read the names.

Mr. CONGER. The Speaker of course will check the proceedings when the proper time comes.

The Clerk proceeded to read the names of members who had voted.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. HUTCHINS. It is so near the time of the final adjournment of this session, but ten minutes remaining, that I will not insist on the resolution.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BOYD, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Orrin L. Shippen, there being no adverse report thereon.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent leave was given to Mr. WHITE to have printed in the RECORD some remarks on the proper treatment of the Mormon question. [See Appendix.]

PRINTING OF REPORT.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The Committee on Commerce ask to have printed 2,000 extra copies of House report No. 342, including report of the minority.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CHARLES W. BUTTON.

Mr. COLERICK, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7257) for the relief of Charles W. Button; which was read twice, committed to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

INAUGURAL CEREMONIES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is requested to state that after the final adjournment the members of this House will form and go in a body to the Senate for the purpose of being present at the inaugural exercises in the Senate.

PRESERVATION OF HOUSE ARCHIVES.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts, and I will ask for its present consideration, as it affects the preservation of property of great value which cannot be replaced, consisting of the original manuscript records of this House. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Accounts, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 391) providing for arranging and classifying the files of the House now stored under the Hall of the House, submits the following report:

That your committee have visited the rooms assigned to the clerk for the storage of original papers, and find an actual and immediate necessity for the removal of the large collection of valuable executive and miscellaneous documents stored beneath the Hall of the House.

The originals in this store-room are of great value, being the only manuscript record of legislation from the First to the Thirtieth Congress, and to properly examine, arrange, and transfer these papers to the fire-proof rooms recently perfected by the Architect of the Capitol will require months of labor. Your committee therefore unanimously recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized to appoint a clerk, whose duties shall be to properly arrange, classify, and place in the fire-proof rooms adjoining the file-room the large collection of original manuscripts now stored under the Hall of the House; also to assist in the preparation and filing of papers of the Forty-sixth Congress; said clerk to be paid, until otherwise ordered, out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives a compensation per diem the same as is now paid messengers in the House library.

The resolution was agreed to.

CHARLES H. FRANK.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the bill of the Senate, No. 1334, for the relief of Charles H. Frank.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I ask a vote on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WARNER. I move to lay the bill aside. There are reasons why it should not pass, but I have not time to state them now.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. This is my man, and I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. WARNER. Let it be passed over, and take up the next bill.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I call the previous question on the bill.

Mr. WARNER. Then I will call for the yeas and nays.

Many MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. CONGER. I hope the gentleman will not devote the last moments of his time here in filibustering against a pension bill.

BILLS APPROVED.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 688) for the relief of the sureties of Franklin Travis;

An act (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 7251) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes; and

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 419) to print 15,000 copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the statistics of the annual production of gold and silver in the United States.

NOTIFICATION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. TUCKER, from the committee to wait on the President of the United States, reported that, in conjunction with the committee appointed on behalf of the Senate, they had performed that duty, and the President had requested them to inform the two Houses of Congress that he had no further communication to make to them.

LATE CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION IN CINCINNATI, OHIO.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. Nearly two years ago a resolution was introduced into this House challenging the methods by which my colleague, Mr. BUTTERWORTH, and myself were elected to this Congress. The resolution was discussed at some length, and finally adopted. Under the resolution the Speaker appointed a committee of investigation. To be brief, that committee went to the city of Cincinnati and took testimony at an expense of nearly six thousand dollars to the United States Government. That testimony was regarded of sufficient importance to be printed, at an additional expense to the Government. I demand, therefore, that before the final adjournment of this Congress the committee shall state to this House and to the country, for the benefit of my colleague as well as of myself, why no report of that investigation has been made to this House.

Mr. CARLISLE. Perhaps if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG] would ask the members of the minority of that committee, they could inform him why the report on this subject was not made at the last session before the adjournment.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I am not asking the minority or the majority of the committee. I am asking why the committee have not made any report.

Mr. CARLISLE. Those gentlemen stated that it was so late in the session that they had not time to prepare the views of the minority, and besides they wanted to call another witness, Mr. Sayler. At the beginning of this session of Congress I informed the gentleman from Michigan, who is at the head of the minority of the committee, [Mr. CONGER,] that if they desired to call that witness it could be done as we desired to make a report. They have not called him.

A resolution has been adopted by the House to-day authorizing committees desiring to make reports to file them with the Clerk of the House. If there is no objection from the minority of the committee, a report will be made and filed with the Clerk under that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] authorizes a minority of a committee to file its views with the report of the majority.

Mr. CONGER. The committee has had no opportunity to meet and consider a report, and has not met and considered any report on that subject. I desire to say that the minority have never interposed any obstacle or objection to the majority making any report, provided a former member of Congress from Cincinnati, Mr. Sayler, could be called before the committee and examined.

Mr. CARLISLE. Why did you not call him?

Mr. CONGER. The committee has never been called together for that purpose.

Mr. CARLISLE. I notified the gentleman that I would call the committee together any day he wanted to call a witness.

Mr. CONGER. And we notified the gentleman of the time we would call the witness.

VALEDICTORY OF THE SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER. The work of the Forty-sixth Congress is done. Before uttering the final words of its adjournment precedent justifies a few appropriate reflections.

In 1874 the democratic party, after a long interval, obtained control of this House. With the close of this session it is again in a minority. At the outset it had to face a financial crisis almost unparalleled in our history. Labor unemployed, trade depressed, commercial distress widespread, gloom everywhere. It stopped extravagance, established economy in administration, restored confidence, and now with gladness it beholds the Republic launched upon a career of unexampled prosperity.

It found gold at a premium and the notes of the Government at a discount. It leaves the credit of the United States better than ever before, and unequaled in the money markets of the world.

It has witnessed the removal of sectional distrust and the restoration of perfect unity within our borders. It has given birth to an era of fraternal concord. Men of all classes and every section seem only to strive who shall best serve the common weal.

With the expenditures of the Government and with payments for interest reduced, the crowning triumph of its administration was the effort to refund the public debt at 3 per cent.

I am sincerely grateful to the members of the House on every side for the vote of thanks with which they have honored me. I am sensible how much I owe to the generous forbearance and active goodwill of my fellow-members. Thrice elected to this exalted position, there may be personal pride for me to remember that during all the service no decision of the Chair has been overruled. But it is of higher import, and the renown more enduring to the House of Representatives, that its fair fame for this entire period is unstained.

Members have differed widely, and yet, manifestly acting from deep conviction of duty, they have won mutual esteem. For myself, I shall retire from the Speaker's chair with unkind feeling toward not a solitary member.

Wishing you, one and all, a safe return to your homes, it now only remains for me, in obedience to the mandate of the Constitution, to declare this House adjourned without day. [Loud applause.]

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows, viz:

By Mr. WILLIAM ALDRICH: The petition of the Yearly Meeting of Friends, against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 5638) to provide for reorganizing, arming, and desciplining the militia—to the Committee on the Militia.

By Mr. ANDERSON: Three petitions of citizens of Jackson, Davis, and Ellis Counties, Kansas, against the passage of Senate bill No. 496—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BURROWS: The petition of citizens of Michigan, for the passage of an interstate-commerce bill—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of citizens of Michigan, for the amendment of the patent laws—to the Committee on Patents.

Also, the petition of citizens of Michigan, for the passage of an income-tax law—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of citizens of Michigan, that the Commissioner of Agriculture be made a Cabinet officer—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. DEERING: The petition of ex-soldiers of Chickasaw County, Iowa, who were inmates of rebel prisons, for the enactment of a law granting them pensions—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of ex-soldiers of Chickasaw County, Iowa, against the passage of Senate bill No. 496—to the committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. EDWARD L. MARTIN: The petition of John Heyd and others, for the amendment of the patent laws—to the Committee on Patents.

Also, the petition of J. S. Willis and others, that the Commissioner of Agriculture be made a member of the Cabinet—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, the petition of R. D. Leech and others, for the passage of the interstate-commerce bill—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of George W. Killen and others, for the passage of a law taxing incomes—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SPRINGER: The petition of Seth Driggs, for relief—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. WEAVER: The petitions of Alfred Kelly and 30 others, of V. B. Knowles and 100 others, and of J. Nickell and 100 others, against refunding the public debt and for paying the same—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of John C. Green and 25 others, of Illinois, for the passage of the Weaver soldier bill—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TO THE

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. RICHARD P. BLAND,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 10, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. BLAND said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: On the 16th day of December last I introduced and had referred to the Committee of the Whole as a pending amendment to the funding bill the following:

Strike out all after enacting clause and insert as follows:

"That of the coin now in the Treasury the sum of $100,000,000 is hereby appropriated for the payment of the interest-bearing debt of the United States due in the years 1880 and 1881: And it is further provided, That the sum of $100,000,000 of revenues not otherwise appropriated be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purposes aforesaid: It is further provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be coined the maximum amount of silver bullion into standard silver dollars in the manner now authorized by law, and shall pay out such dollars in the redemption of the public debt hereinbefore mentioned monthly, and the particular bonds to be redeemed from time to time in pursuance to this act shall be determined by lot under such rules as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

"SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws, so far as the same may authorize the issuing of bonds for the purpose of refunding or redeeming the interest-bearing debt of the United States be, and they are hereby, repealed."

The debt that is now or during this year will be redeemable at the pleasure of the Government is as follows:

Loan.	Rate.	Payable.	Redeemable.	Amount.
February, 1861	6 per cent.	Dec. 1, 1880		$13,414,000
Oregon war	6 per cent.	July 1, 1881		711,800
July and August, 1861	6 per cent.		June 30, 1881	145,786,500
1863, (1881s)	6 per cent.		June 30, 1881	57,787,250
1881, funded	5 per cent.		May 1, 1881	469,651,050
Outstanding, Nov. 1, 1880				687,350,600

Constituting a total of $687,350,600. The proposed amendment utilizes one hundred millions of coin now in the Treasury and one hundred millions of revenue for the payment of the debt. This would leave a balance of $487,350,600 to be provided for. This amount is provided for by the amendment in requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to execute the laws of Congress enacted with special view of meeting and paying the public debt. All the bonds now outstanding are coin bonds, the 5-20 bonds, that were originally payable in lawful money, having been redeemed and canceled. To provide the coin to pay these coin bonds the silver law was passed by Congress. This law authorizes and requires the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase, at market rates, not less than two, nor more than four million dollars' worth of silver bullion per month, and to coin the same monthly into standard silver dollars. At the present price of silver bullion two million dollars' worth per month, or twenty-four million dollars' worth per annum, will coin something over twenty-seven million dollars; so that the profit on twenty-four millions of bullion is $3,000,000. It will be observed that the law requires to be coined twenty-four million dollars' worth of bullion as the minimum amount of bullion to be coined, so that $27,000,000 is the minimum amount of dollars to be coined, for the law requires not less than twenty-four million dollars' worth of bullion to be coined annually. If the Secretary of the Treasury would coin the maximum amount of silver bullion, namely, forty-eight million dollars' worth annually, we would have as the product of this fifty-four million silver dollars as the maximum amount authorized to be coined annually. The profit on this would be $6,000,000. We therefore see that a profit of six millions annually would accrue to the Government should we coin standard silver dollars at the maximum rate required by law.

By coining forty-eight million dollars' worth of bullion per annum we can pay off fifty-four millions of the debt every year at a clear profit of six millions on every forty-eight million dollars of revenue invested in silver bullion in the manner now authorized by law. It may be remarked right here that there is common misunderstanding of the provisions of the law restoring the silver dollar. It is generally supposed that the law requires the coinage of not less than two nor more than four millions of standard silver dollars per month, but such is not the terms of the law. The law requires the purchase of not less than two million nor more than four million dollars' worth of bullion, and this bullion must be coined monthly into standard dollars; consequently two million dollars' worth per month or twenty-four per annum will coin over twenty-seven millions of dollars per annum.

It is thus made plain that if we coin standard silver dollars at the maximum rate required by law the Government will realize a profit of over six millions of dollars. I will call it only six millions, and this margin will be sufficient to cover any probable rise of bullion in the market. After discharging two hundred millions of the debt as proposed we have, as before stated, $487,350,600; say four hundred and eighty-seven millions to be paid in the coinage of silver as required. If we purchase monthly, as the law in all respects authorizes and provides for, four millions' worth of silver bullion per month or forty-eight millions per annum will purchase sufficient bullion to coin and pay fifty-four millions annually. This will enable us to pay the debt in nine years, which is less than any time proposed in any other proposition pending before the committee. By reducing the principal annually, we pro tanto reduce interest; so that, calculating the interest at 5 per cent., in nine years we would pay less than nine million dollars as interest. Add nine millions as interest to the four hundred and eighty-seven millions principal and we have a total of four hundred and ninety-six millions to be paid in nine years.

The profit on the purchase and coinage of silver bullion is over twelve million dollars on every hundred millions purchased coined. The profit on the coinage of four hundred and ninety-six millions would be not less than sixty million dollars. Subtract sixty millions from four hundred and ninety-six millions and we have four hundred and thirty-six millions. This shows that four hundred and thirty-six millions of revenue will purchase silver bullion sufficient to coin and pay the whole debt of four hundred and eighty-seven millions principal.

The facts stated are based upon the law and mathematics. They cannot be disputed. It may be said that during this period silver bullion would appreciate in the market, especially when the Government purchased this increased amount. In my calculations I have made much allowance for that because I have simply placed the profit on the coinage of silver dollars at only twelve millions on every hundred coined, when in fact the profit is really at this time near thirteen millions on every hundred millions coined. It was supposed that to purchase and coin two millions per month would enhance the price of bullion, but it has only had the effect probably to sustain the price, for silver bullion is not worth more now than when the silver law was enacted. Silver bullion never can be of the same market value as gold bullion so long as the Government coins gold without limit and excludes silver from that advantage. The demand of the country is that we should come to the double standard.

Yet the Secretary of the Treasury, by coining silver at the very lowest limit possible under the law, seeks to continue the gold standard. The President in every annual message and the Secretary of the Treasury in all his annual reports implore Congress to stop the coinage of silver. The administration of the Government is hostile to the silver dollar. The Secretary has the following to say in his report for 1879, (Executive Document No. 2, Forty-sixth Congress, second session:)

It would seem to be the best policy for the present to limit the aggregate issue of our silver dollars, based on the ratio of 16 to 1, to such sums as can clearly be maintained at par with gold, until the price of silver in the market shall assume a definite ratio to gold, when that ratio should be adopted and our coins made to conform to it, and the Secretary respectfully recommends that he be authorized to discontinue the coinage of the silver dollar when the amount outstanding shall exceed $50,000,000.

He again respectfully calls the attention of Congress to the importance of further limiting the coinage of the silver dollar. The market value of the bullion in this coin has been during the past year from 10 to 16 per cent. less than the market value of the bullion in the gold dollar. The total amount of silver dollars coined to November 1, 1879, under the act of February 28, 1878, was $45,206,200, of which $13,002,842 was in circulation and the remainder, $32,203,358, in the Treasury at that time. No effort has been spared to put this coin in circulation. Owing to its limited coinage, it has been kept at par; but its free coinage would soon reduce its current value to its bullion value, and thus establish a single silver standard. The inevitable result would be to exclude gold coin from circulation. It is impossible to ascertain what amount of silver coin, based upon the ratio of 16 of silver to 1 of gold, can be maintained at par with gold, but it is manifest that this can only be done by the Government holding in its vaults the great body of the silver coin. It would seem that nothing would be gained by an unlimited coinage unless it is desirable to measure all values by the silver standard. The Secretary cannot too strongly urge the importance of adjusting the coinage ratio of the two metals by treaties with commercial nations, and, until this can be done, of limiting the coinage of the silver dollar to such a sum as, in the opinion of Congress, would enable the Department to readily maintain the standard dollars of gold and silver at par with each other.

In his examination before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures at the last session of Congress, I asked him questions on this subject, to which he gave answers which I will quote, (Miscellaneous Document No. 34, Forty-sixth Congress, second session:)

Mr. BLAND. Was not that the reason why the Clearing House Association has excluded silver, and is not that one of the reasons why the Government acceded to that rule of the Clearing House Association—that is, for the purpose of holding the silver and preventing its circulation?

Secretary SHERMAN. I would not state it in exactly that way. I would state it in this way: that as gold and silver are both standards of money, I would seek to maintain gold as the standard of money, and therefore I would seek, by holding the silver, to prevent its depreciation below the gold standard. Perhaps that answers your question substantially.

Mr. BLAND. Then it is as much the act of the Government that silver is not in circulation as it is the act of the people?

Secretary SHERMAN. Yes. We do not issue it unless we can issue it at par with gold. Whenever Congress desires it, it can (by making free coinage of silver, and by simply saying that silver shall be the standard of value to the exclusion of the gold standard) do it very quickly.

It is quite clear that it is the settled policy with the Administration to set at defiance the law of Congress and the will of the people on this question.

Mr. Chairman, as the representatives of the people, I deem it our duty by affirmative legislation, such as is proposed by the amendment offered, to compel the Secretary to execute the laws of Congress in the spirit they were enacted. The only debt of the Government that calls specifically for coin payments is our bonded debt. Then, why not coin the money and pay it? There is no injustice done the bondholder, because, first, his bond specially demands coin; secondly, the silver dollar is as valuable as the gold dollar. If he desires it, he can take silver certificates for the coin. These certificates are as valuable as any other money and as convenient.

Mr. Chairman, what are the forces arrayed against the proposition I have submitted? They are, first, the national banks, because every silver dollar and silver certificate issued comes directly in competition with their issues. If we had four or five hundred million of silver dollars or silver certificates in circulation it would displace the notes of national banks; they would have to wind up business. The next opposition comes from those whose interest it is to continue the single standard of gold valuation. Every silver dollar or silver certificate that is coined comes in direct competition with the gold dollar. This has the effect of reducing the value of gold. This reduction in the value of gold by the use of silver as well as gold is what is meant by the double standard, so that my amendment seeks to establish in this Government the double standard. The Secretary of the Treasury, in defiance of Congress and the will of the people, is determined to evade the law restoring the silver dollar and thus maintain the gold standard. This being the case we ought, in equity and justice to the people of this country, check him in his arbitrary course.

We have the opportunity here presented that should not be neglected. These bonds are specifically payable in coin. We have a law enacted for the purpose of providing for the coin in which to pay them. Let us demand that this law be executed. If we stand idly by and permit this domination on the part of this Administration without protest we will have failed in performing a duty to our constituents.

Mr. Chairman, I know there are many members here who object to this proposition, although they are favorable to the double standard. Their objection is that they dislike to discriminate in this manner of designating what particular debt shall or shall not be paid in silver or in other currency. My answer is, in the first place the debt is by law made payable in coin; secondly, unless there is some mandatory statute those who administer the Government will not in good faith execute the silver law.

If silver was coined without limit there would be no demand for further legislation upon the subject. Even if the Secretary of the Treasury would coin silver at the maximum rate now authorized there would be no object in passing the amendment I proposed. The object aimed at by the amendment is simply to carry out in good faith the present law of the land. The direction given that this money be paid upon these bonds conforms in all respects with law and justice. The ultimate object aimed at is to compel the coinage and placing in circulation of a sufficient amount of silver dollars to bring about a valuation based upon the double standard, instead of, as now, the single gold standard. All our debts, public and private, are paid from the products of labor. If these products are measured by the double standard of both gold and silver they will of necessity command better prices. As an illustration, let me say that a single standard of gold means a limited supply of money. A limited supply of money necessitates low prices. Low prices for the product of labor means that it will require a greater amount of this product to pay off a debt than would be required if prices were different. It is the interest of the debtor to have the double standard of valuation in the payment of his debt, because, measured by that standard, it requires a less amount of labor or the products of labor to pay his debt. It is the interest of the creditor, in this case the bondholder, to have his debt paid in the products of labor measured by this single standard of gold, because he will receive a greater amount of the products of labor measured by this standard than the standard of gold and silver. The laws of the land give to the debtor in this country the right to pay all debts, public and private, in the products of labor measured by the double standard. The Secretary of the Treasury refuses to execute that law, hence it is the duty of this Congress to compel him to do it.

If the Administration would execute this law in good faith there would be no necessity for this amendment. But when we all know that is not done and will not be done, then it becomes our duty to legislate affirmatively upon the subject. This is the fitting time and place for this mandatory legislation. I am told by many gentlemen here that while they favor this proposition, yet in view of the fact that the President would veto the measure it would be useless to pass it. That he would veto it is certain from the recommendations in his messages and from the fact that he vetoed the silver bill. This being the case, gentlemen who are friendly to this measure, and a sufficient number of them probably to pass it, hesitate because in this case the debt would continue drawing 5 and 6 per cent. interest, when it can now be converted into a debt drawing not over 3 or 3½ per cent., and reserving the right in the Government to call in the bonds and pay them off at any time. These considerations should have due weight, but in my view of the case I think we ought to enact such laws as we believe to be demanded by the tax-payers of the Government, and let those who veto them or override them take the consequences.

The Secretary in his report before quoted recommends that the coinage of silver be limited to the sum of $50,000,000. He is very solicitous to so limit the coinage as to keep the silver dollar at a par with the gold. The Secretary says in the report named:

It is impossible to ascertain what amount of silver coin, based upon the ratio of sixteen of silver to one of gold, can be maintained at par with gold; but it is manifest that this can only be done by the Government holding in its vaults the great body of the silver coin.

This language, taken in connection with his statement before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures in answer to my questions, shows the animus of his intentions as regard the silver dollar. First, he proposes not to coin it; secondly, if it is coined, it must be hoarded so as to maintain the single standard of gold. Inasmuch as the Secretary here calls upon Congress for legislation, let us legislate, but let us legislate quite differently from his recommendations. The Director of the Mint, in his annual report, 1879, in Executive Document No. 2, Forty-sixth Congress, second session, gives the circulation of France as follows:

	Francs.	Dollars.
Paper	2,418,419,689	466,755,000
Gold	3,800,000,000	733,400,000
Silver, unlimited tender	1,900,000,000	366,700,000
Silver, limited tender	306,450,000	59,144,850
Total	8,424,869,689=1,625,999,850

This shows that there are 366,700,000 of unlimited legal-tender silver dollars in circulation, measured by our coinage, and $59,144,850 of subsidiary, thus showing that France, with a population of fifteen million less people than the United States, circulates coins of the value of over four hundred millions of legal-tender silver dollars. The French relation, it must be borne in mind, is 15½ to 1, while ours is 16 to 1. This is an item of no small importance in our favor.

These figures prove that should we coin the amount of silver demanded by the amendment I have proposed, it would not disturb the parity between the gold and silver dollar. The effect would be to reduce the value of the gold dollar by entering as a competitor therewith the amount of silver coined. This silver and the certificates that would be issued for coin deposited under the law would have the effect, as before stated, of driving out of circulation the notes of the national banks. When the three hundred and odd millions of national-bank notes are thus displaced it would give room for all the silver that we would coin; indeed it would open the door to the safe and necessary free coinage of silver. Those who favor a currency of gold and national banks exclusively are, as a matter of course, hostile to the further coinage of silver. The people demand a currency based upon the two metals—the double standard. They are opposed to the exclusive gold valuation, and hence it is our duty to take such necessary steps in our legislation as will secure that end.

Interstate Freights and Passengers.

SPEECH OF HON. JOSEPH H. ACKLEN,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, January 15, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 3115) for the regulation of interstate freights and passengers, and to relieve the same from the restrictions of local quarantines.

Mr. ACKLEN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The public health should take equal rank with questions of education and finance. To prevent the spreading of disease by wise health laws is as commendable as the building of hospitals to receive the afflicted. The wisdom of the legislator may often render unnecessary the charity of the philanthropist. When a law is needed for the general good, forced constructions of our Constitution should not be presented as insurmountable obstacles. It was not until after the fearful epidemic of 1878 that the country at large was aroused fully to the necessity of strict quarantine measures to prevent the spread of future visitations of the yellow-fever scourge, which during that year well-nigh paralyzed the industries of the entire southern section of our country.

The National Board of Health was the natural outgrowth of a universal desire on the part of Congress to put such checks upon the introduction and spread of infectious and contagious diseases as they could by legislation. That the efforts of this board in matters of sanitation, despite the attacks upon it from certain sections, have been fruitful in beneficial results to the country at large no one uninfluenced by selfish considerations or personal animosities will for a moment deny. That a board thus constituted to deal for the first time with a subject of such grave importance to the whole country should give universal satisfaction is not for a moment to be expected.

Human nature contains too much selfishness and all the professions too many petty rivalries to have anticipated universal commendation for the board. That they may have committed some errors is simply to admit that they were not above humanity in general. But that the important trust of the public health confided to them has not been jealously guarded and judiciously treated is as untrue in fact as it is ungenerous to the high character of the men who compose the board.

I have been led to these remarks since the bill to which I address myself proposes to vest certain additional powers in the board not already conferred by existing legislation. The dreadful loss of life by the epidemic of 1878 had prepared the public mind for a panic the year following, and therefore when the yellow fever again made its appearance the "shot-gun" quarantine became general throughout the South. So great was the alarm and dread of the fearful disease that persons were often stopped in their travels on the merest suspicion and freights consisting of the necessaries of life debarred from passing through towns on their way to others whose people stood in actual need of them. Instances have actually been brought to my attention where physicians and nurses with medicines have been stopped from passing through a county by rail to reach the afflicted at a point more remote.

Fortunately for the good name of our people such inhumanities were not numerous, but they strongly tend to emphasize the fact that in such times of excitement and fear the people in localities that may become subject to infectious and contagious diseases are rendered unfit to frame rules and regulations for its arrest, prevention, and spread.

The fears of a community under these circumstances induce them to pursue that course only which they deem necessary for their own individual protection, without any reference or consideration for the rights or safety of others.

Then it was that business men, interested in the commerce of the country, while deploring the ravages of the epidemics of 1878 and 1879, began to see in the wide-spread alarm and consequent shot-gun quarantines which they produced a danger, different, it is true, but one almost as great as the disease itself—the destruction of commerce and intercourse, and the financial ruin of the business interests of the country.

The position which I assume, that people of a community when panic-stricken from fear of a contagious and infectious disease are incompetent to act calmly and wisely for its arrest or prevention, will hardly be gainsaid by any one who has once witnessed the wide-spread alarm consequent upon reports of an advancing epidemic.

The bill to which I address these remarks looks to a remedy for this evil. It reads as follows:

A bill for the regulation of interstate freights and passengers, and to relieve the same from the restrictions of local quarantines.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever any city, town, or place, in any State or Territory, shall have been declared infected with yellow fever or other contagious or infectious disease, by either the President of the United States or the governor of any State or Territory, on information furnished by the National Board of Health, authority being hereby conferred to make such declaration, or should any State or territorial board of health or other competent authority, in the lawful exercise of the police power of the State, make and publish declarations of quarantine, then the executive committee of the National Board of Health, and the governor, or his appointee, if he chooses to serve, of the State or Territory which shall have made such declarations, or for the State or Territory where said infected city, town, or place may be located, shall be constituted under this act an executive committee to establish in said State or Territory, at such points as they deem best along the line of the railroads, water-courses, or other lines of travel leading from said infected city, town, or place, quarantine stations, and appoint quarantine officers for the inspection of freights and passengers and those vehicles of transportation whose starting point or whose destination is beyond the limits of said State or Territory: Provided, That should the governor, or his appointee of the State or Territory, decline to serve, then the other persons constituted under this section as the executive committee shall proceed at once to carry out its provisions.

SEC. 2. The quarantine officers appointed under the provisions of section 1 of this act shall make their inspection and issue their certificates, under such rules and regulations as may be promulgated by the National Board of Health. They shall have the sole and exclusive inspection and certification in the State of all freights and passengers whose starting point or whose destination is beyond the borders of said State or Territory.

SEC. 3. That when said quarantine officers, under the rules and regulations prescribed by the National Board of Health, shall have duly inspected said freight or passengers, and certified that they are free from infection, it shall be unlawful for any person or persons, whether claiming authority under a State, municipality, board of health, or otherwise, to stop, detain, or in any manner interfere with the passage over said railroads or water-courses or other lines of travel of said freights or passengers, or their vehicles of transportation, on the charge or ground that they may be infected, or dangerous to the public health.

SEC. 4. The provisions of this act shall not, however, be construed as applying to freights or passengers whose starting point and whose destination lie wholly within the limits of the same State or Territory.

SEC. 5. Any person or persons who, contrary to the provisions of this act, willfully arrests or detains, or aids or abets in so doing, any freights or passengers, or their vehicles of transportation, on the ground that they may be infected or dangerous to the public health, after the same shall have been certified by the quarantine officers appointed under the provisions of this act as free from infection, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall pay a penalty of $1,000, one-half to be paid to the informer, and shall be punished by imprisonment not less than six nor more than twelve months.

SEC. 6. The expenses incurred under the provisions of this act shall be paid out of such funds as have been, or may be, appropriated for the use of the National Board of Health.

That feature of the bill which in the first section refers to the declaration of infection by the National Board of Health confers no additional power upon the board.

In the original bill introduced on this subject the President of the National Board of Health, the Surgeon-General of the Army, the Surgeon-General of the Navy, and the president of the State or territorial board of health, if he chooses to serve, were constituted the executive committee; but on consultation with these parties, as will be seen by letters placed as an appendix to these remarks, it was deemed best to confer this power upon the executive committee of the National Board of Health.

If the principle which I laid down, that "in times of epidemics the local authorities of a community, by reason of their fears, are hardly competent to deal with the impending danger in a calm and wise manner," be correct, then it follows that this authority, to act promptly and effectually, must be vested in some body entirely removed from any such local influences; and I submit, without further argument, that the parties designated in this section as constituting the executive committee would command, by reason of their position and special knowledge of the subject to be treated, the entire confidence of the people threatened by the disease.

The remaining sections of the bill raise at once the question as to the constitutional powers of Congress under the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, which confers upon Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes," to enact any legislation affecting the police power of a State.

Section 4 of the bill, which reads—

The provisions of this act shall not, however, be construed as applying to freights or passengers whose starting point and whose destination lie wholly within the limits of the same State or Territory—shows that it is not within the intent and meaning of this act to assert any power over commerce that is not entirely interstate in its nature.

The question therefore resolves itself between the power of Congress, under the commerce clause of the Constitution above quoted, to say what freights and passengers shall pass through a State, and the police power of the State to declare what freights and passengers shall or shall not enter her territory.

"Salus populi est suprema lex" has passed into a maxim which is as untrue in fact as it would be unwise in practice.

Nothing, in my opinion, is justly above the law of the land. Laws are framed for the good and welfare of society. They should be obeyed as they exist, and if they are bad and defective the surest way to secure their repeal is to enforce them.

Appreciating the importance of the constitutional questions involved in this case, I have felt it my duty to examine at length all the authorities touching upon the questions raised by this bill.

In the celebrated case The City of New York vs. Miln, the question was raised as to the constitutionality of the act of the State of New York concerning passengers and vessels coming to the port of New York, as to whether this was a regulation of commerce or of police. This act required the master of any ship arriving from a foreign port within twenty-four hours after its arrival to report to the mayor in writing and under oath the place of birth, age, occupation, &c., of every passenger brought in his ship, and prescribed penalties for a violation of the same.

And in this connection I desire particularly to call the attention of members of this House to the fact that there is a marked difference between commerce from foreign ports and commerce between the States, and that this distinction should not be forgotten in a consideration of the questions involved in this case. That the police power of the State extended to guaranteeing the State and the city against the importation of disease is unquestionable, but the point is as to whether the power over the particular subject or the manner of its exercise was or was not restrained by the Constitution of the United States.

Justice Story, who dissented from the opinion of the court rendered in this case, said:

That the power of Congress to regulate commerce is exclusive, and not concurrent with the States, and that this doctrine was clearly enunciated in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden; that this act of New York is not a mere police law on the subject of paupers, but a regulation of commerce to prevent paupers in certain cases from entering and remaining in the State; and although he fully admitted the power of the States to pass health and quarantine laws, and other police laws of a similar nature, not contravening the acts of Congress rightfully passed under their constitutional authority, and to pass poor-laws and laws to prevent the introduction of paupers into the State, under like qualifications, and even in the exercise of their legitimate authority to use the same means with Congress, if the means be suitable to the end, yet it was with this reserve, that those means be not exclusively vested in Congress. A State (he says) cannot make a regulation of commerce to enforce its health laws, because it is a means withdrawn from its authority. It may be admitted that it is a means adapted to the end; but it is quite a different question whether it be a means within the competency of the State jurisdiction. The States have a right to borrow money, and borrowing by the issue of bills of credit would certainly be an appropriate means; but we all know that the emission of bills of credit by a State is expressly prohibited by the Constitution. If the power to regulate commerce be exclusive in Congress, then there is no difference between an express and an implied prohibition upon the States.

* * * * * * *

If this were a new question in this court, wholly untouched by doctrine or decision, I should not hesitate to go into a full examination of all the grounds upon which concurrent authority is attempted to be maintained. But in point of fact the whole argument on this very question, as prescribed by the learned counsel on the present occasion, was presented to the learned counsel who argued the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden; and it was then deliberately examined and deemed inadmissible by the court. Mr. Chief-Justice Marshall, with his accustomed accuracy and fulness of illustration, reviewed at that time the whole grounds of the controversy, and from that time to the present the question has been considered (as far as I know) to be at rest. The power given to Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States has been deemed exclusive from the nature and objects of the power and the necessary implications growing out of its exercise. Full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power and leaves no residuum; and a grant of the whole to one is incompatible with a grant to another of a part. When a State proceeds to regulate commerce with foreign nations or among the States it is doing the very thing which Congress is authorized to do; and it has been remarked with great cogency and accuracy that the regulation of a subject indicates and designates the entire result, applying to those parts which remain as they were, as well as to those which are altered. It produces a uniform whole, which is as much disturbed and deranged by changing what the regulating power designs to leave untouched as that upon which it has operated.

* * * * * * *

It is no answer to the objection to say that the States will have too much wisdom and prudence to exercise the authority to so great an extent. Laws were actually passed of a retaliatory nature by the States of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut during the steamboat controversy which threatened the safety and security of the Union, and demonstrated the necessity that the power to regulate commerce among the States should be exclusive in the Union, in order to prevent the most injurious restraints upon it.

And I call attention to the fact that in the case of Groves vs. Slaughter (15 Peters, S. C. R., 503, 510) Mr. Justice McLean and Mr. Justice Baldwin give the full weight of their opinion in favor of the exclusiveness of this power of Congress to regulate commerce; others of the judges thought the question did not arise in the case. Mr. Chief-Justice Taney considered the power of Congress as concurrent with that of the States.

Justice Story further says:

That the States of this Union cannot constitutionally tax the commerce of the United States for the purpose of paying any expense incident to the execution of their police laws; and that the commerce of the United States includes an intercourse of persons, as well as the importation of merchandise.

If further additional authority should be deemed necessary I would refer to 9 Wheaton (pages 203–208) as well as to Blackstone's Commentaries (pages 251 and 252) as demonstrating beyond all doubt or question that the authority of Congress extends to quarantine laws and pilotage laws, and that any act of a State in the absence of an act on the part of Congress which may be deemed constitutional must yet bow to the laws of Congress when they are enacted, for it cannot be disputed that when the power is given all appropriate means to carry it into effect are necessarily included; that under cover of the police power of the State such rules and regulations might be framed as to place restraints upon commerce to the extent of creating such rivalries among the States as would be a source of constant difficulty and discontent.

Members of this House entertaining different views from me on this question would doubtlessly maintain that to the police power of the State alone should be relegated all questions concerning rules and regulations to be framed for the arrest, prevention, or spread of epidemic diseases. The maxim salus populi est suprema lex would no doubt be the bulwark from behind which they would launch all of their arguments. Such a position would be as untenable in law as it would be unwise in practice.

In the celebrated passenger cases which excited the attention of the country, and upon which so many admirable constitutional arguments were lavished, I find that in February, 1799, when the yellow fever again made its appearance and raged with great violence in New York, Congress passed a law which declares that quarantines and other restraints which shall be required and established by the health laws of any State, or pursuant thereto, respecting any vessels arriving in or bound to any port or district thereof, whether from a foreign port or place, or from any district in the United States, shall be duly observed by the collectors and all their officers of the revenue of the United States.

Further, in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden the court were manifestly of the opinion that health laws, harbor laws, and police laws generally do not necessarily conflict with the power of the United States to regulate commerce, but that both the States and the United States may and ought to exercise their respective powers together in the ports which are common to both; but the doctrine distinctly maintained is that all police laws are constitutional unless in conflict with some law of the United States; and this branch of the opinion is fully sustained in the case of New York vs. Miln and in the license cases, which show beyond doubt that until Congress should choose to act in the matter of regulating the public health and provide means to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases, the police power of the State would naturally be supreme in the management thereof. When Congress has taken the initiatory step, however, as in the formation of a national board of health, amply endowed by the funds of the Government, and confers upon this national board of health such authority as would enable them in their wisdom to provide rules and regulations paramount to any to be exercised by the States, their rules must bow to the superior law, and this would be both wise and desirable for the public welfare.

It was said by Mr. Hall, in his argument of the passenger cases, that "a mere power in the Federal or State government is latent and dormant; like the electricity of the air, it is unfelt and unseen until its energies are concentrated into the thunderbolt of a law;" and this position I maintain upon this question, namely, that the power in Congress is latent and dormant; that when it is exercised in the manner or shape of a law, such act is paramount to any State power or legislation on the subject.

It has been said, however, that all of the States of the Union constantly enforce the writ of ne exeat, and that many of the States, since the adoption of the Constitution, have passed laws prohibiting the egress of debtors without the consent of their creditors. While this is true yet it does not, in my opinion, touch at all the question under consideration.

In the opinion of Justice McLean, in the passenger cases, (7 Howard, 406,) he says:

As early as May 27, 1796, Congress enacted that "the President be authorized to direct the revenue officers commanding forts and revenue-cutters to aid in the execution of quarantine, and also in the execution of the health laws of the States respectively." And by the act of February 25, 1799, which repealed the above act, more enlarged provisions were enacted, requiring the revenue officers of the United States to conform to and aid in the execution of the quarantine and health laws of the States. In the first section of this law there is a proviso, that "nothing therein shall enable any State to collect a duty of tonnage or impost without the consent of Congress."

A proviso limits the provisions of the act into which it is introduced. But this proviso may be considered as not restricted to this purpose. It shows with what caution Congress guarded the commercial power, and it is an authoritative provision against its exercise by the States. An impost, in its enlarged sense, means any tax or tribute imposed by authority, and applies as well to a tax on persons as to a tax on merchandise. In this sense it was no doubt used in the above act. Any other construction would be an imputation on the intelligence of Congress.

If this power to tax passengers from a foreign country belongs to a State, a tax, on the same principle, may be imposed on all persons coming into or passing through it from any other State of the Union. And the New York statute does in fact lay a tax on passengers on board of any coasting-vessel which arrives at the port of New York, with an exception of passengers in vessels from New Jersey, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, who are required to pay for one trip in each month. All other passengers pay the tax every trip.

If this may be done in New York, every other State may do the same, on all the lines of our internal navigation. Passengers on a steamboat which plies on the Ohio, the Mississippi, or on any of our other rivers, or on the lakes, may be required to pay a tax imposed at the discretion of each State within which the boat shall touch. And the same principle will sustain a right in every State to tax all persons who shall pass through its territory on railroad-cars, canal-boats, stages, or in any other manner. This would enable a State to establish and enforce a non-intercourse with every other State.

Also:

The police power of the State cannot draw within its jurisdiction objects which lie beyond it. It meets the commercial power of the Union in dealing with subjects under the protection of that power, yet it can only be exerted under peculiar emergencies and to a limited extent. In guarding the safety, the health, and morals of its citizens a State is restricted to appropriate and constitutional means. If extraordinary expense be incurred, an equitable claim to an indemnity can give no power to a State to tax objects not subject to its jurisdiction.

And from the opinion of Justice Wayne in the same cases, page 435, I quote the following:

Police relates only to the internal concerns of one State; and commerce within it is purely a matter of internal regulation, when confined to those articles which have become so distributed as to form items in the common mass of property. It follows that any regulation which affects the commercial intercourse between any two or more States, referring solely thereto, is within the powers granted exclusively to Congress, and that those regulations which affect only the commerce carried on within one State, or which refer only to subjects of internal police, are within the powers reserved.

In the celebrated case of Gibbons vs. Ogden Mr. Webster in his argument says:

And as some powers have been holden exclusive, and others not so, under the same form of expression, from the nature of the different powers respectively; so, where the power on any one subject is given in general words, like the power to regulate commerce, the true method of construction would be to consider of what parts the grant is composed, and which of those, from the nature of the thing, ought to be considered exclusive. The right set up in this case, under the laws of New York, is a monopoly. Now, he thought it very reasonable to say that the Constitution never intended to leave with the States the power of granting monopolies, either of trade or of navigation; and therefore that, as to this, the commercial power was exclusive in Congress.

And further:

But this is not all; for it is admitted that when Congress and the States have power to legislate over the same subject, the power of Congress, when exercised, controls or extinguishes the State power; and therefore the consequence would seem to follow, from the argument, that all State legislation over such subjects as have been mentioned is, at all times, liable to the superior power of Congress; a consequence which no one would admit for a moment.

And further:

The presence or absence of a non-obstante clause cannot affect the extent or operation of the act of Congress. Congress has no power of revoking State laws, as a distinct power. It legislates over subjects; and over those subjects which are within its power its legislation is supreme, and necessarily overrules all inconsistent or repugnant State legislation.

And further:

There are subjects upon which the United States and the individual States must, of necessity, have concurrent jurisdiction; and all fears and apprehensions of collision in the exercise of these powers, which have been urged in argument, are unfounded. The Constitution has guarded against such an event, by providing that the laws of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. In case of collision, therefore, the State laws must yield to the superior authority of the United States.

The same doctrine is very ably maintained by Kent, who gives as a safe rule of construction and of action—

That if any given power was originally vested in this State, if it has not been exclusively ceded to Congress, or if the exercise of it has not been prohibited to the States, we may then go on in the exercise of the power until it comes practically in collision with the actual exercise of some congressional power. When that happens to be the case, the State authority will so far be controlled; but it will still be good in all those respects in which it does not absolutely contravene the provision of the paramount law.

In the opinion of the court in the same case I find the following:

With regard to the quarantine laws and other regulations of police respecting the public health in the several States, they do not partake of the character of regulations of the commerce of the United States. It had been said that these local regulations were recognized by Congress, which had made them a part of its own system of commerce. But this recognition would have been superfluous if they could have stood without it on the basis of State sovereignty; and so far as their adoption by Congress could be considered as affecting the question, the manner and purpose of the recognition operates the other way. It would be found that by the commercial regulations which Congress had made, a general system was adopted which, if executed in every instance, would have carried ships and vessels into all the ports of the several States, their local quarantine laws to the contrary notwithstanding. An express regulation is therefore introduced requiring the collectors of the customs to conform the execution of their official duties, under the navigation and revenue laws, with the quarantine laws of the respective States. Without such a provision the local health laws must have given way to the supremacy of the navigation and revenue laws of the Union.

* * * * * * *

The subject to be regulated is commerce; and our Constitution being, as was aptly said at the bar, one of enumeration, and not of definition, to ascertain the extent of the power, it becomes necessary to settle the meaning of the word. The counsel for the appellee would limit it to traffic, to buying and selling, or the interchange of commodities, and do not admit that it comprehends navigation. This would restrict a general term, applicable to many objects, to one of its significations. Commerce, undoubtly, is traffic, but it is something more: it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations, and parts of nations, in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse. The mind can scarcely conceive a system for regulating commerce between nations, which shall exclude all laws concerning navigation, which shall be silent on the admission of the vessels of the one nation into the ports of the other, and be confined to prescribing rules for the conduct of individuals, in the actual employment of buying and selling, or of barter.

And further:

The subject to which the power is next applied is to commerce "among the several States." The word "among" means intermingled with. A thing which is among others is intermingled with them. Commerce among the States cannot stop at the external boundary line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior.

* * * * * * *

This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. These are expressed in plain terms, and do not affect the questions which arise in this case or which have been discussed at the bar. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.

That inspection laws may have a remote and considerable influence on commerce will not be denied; but that a power to regulate commerce is the source from which the right to pass them is derived, cannot be admitted. The object of inspection laws is to improve the quality of articles produced by the labor of a country; to fit them for exportation, or, it may be, for domestic use. They act upon the subject before it becomes an article of foreign commerce, or of commerce among the States, and prepare it for that purpose. They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government—all which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are component parts of this mass.

No direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress; and, consequently, they remain subject to State legislation. If the legislative power of the Union can reach them it must be for national purposes—it must be where the power is expressly given for a special purpose, or is clearly incidental to some power which is expressly given.

The acts of Congress, passed in 1796 and 1799, empowering and directing the officers of the General Government to conform to and assist in the execution of the quarantine and health laws of a State, proceed, it is said, upon the idea that these laws are constitutional. It is undoubtedly true that they do proceed upon that idea; and the constitutionality of such laws has never, so far as we are informed, been denied. But they do not imply an acknowledgment that a State may rightfully regulate commerce with foreign nations or among the States, for they do not imply that such laws are an exercise of that power or enacted with a view to it. On the contrary, they are treated as quarantine and health laws, are so denominated in the acts of Congress, and are considered as flowing from the acknowledged power of a State to provide for the health of its citizens. But, as it was apparent that some of the provisions made for this purpose and in virtue of this power might interfere with and be affected by the laws of the United States made for the regulation of commerce, Congress, in that spirit of harmony and conciliation which ought always to characterize the conduct of governments standing in the relation which that of the Union and those of the States bear to each other, has directed its officers to aid in the execution of these laws and has in some measure adapted its own legislation to this object by making provisions in aid of those of the States. But in making these provisions the opinion is unequivocally manifested that Congress may control the State laws, so far as it may be necessary to control them, for the regulation of commerce.

* * * * * * *

The possession of this particular power, then, during the time limited in the Constitution, cannot be admitted to prove the possession of any other similar power.

* * * * * * *

But the adoption of the State system being temporary, being only until further legislative provision shall be made by Congress, shows conclusively an opinion that Congress could control the whole subject, and might adopt the system of the States or provide one of its own.

* * * * * * *

It has been contended by the counsel for the appellant that, as the word "to regulate" implies in its nature full power over the thing to be regulated, it excludes necessarily, the action of all others that would perform the same operation on the same thing. That regulation is designed for the entire result, applying to those parts which remain as they were as well as to those which are altered. It produces a uniform whole, which is as much disturbed and deranged by changing what the regulating power designs to leave untouched as that on which it has operated.

This opinion has been frequently expressed in this court, and is founded as well on the nature of the government as on the words of the Constitution. In argument, however, it has been contended that if a law passed by a State in the exercise of its acknowledged sovereignty comes into conflict with a law passed by Congress in pursuance of the Constitution, they affect the subject and each other like equal opposing powers.

But the framers of our Constitution foresaw this state of things, and provided for it by declaring the supremacy not only of itself but of the laws made in pursuance of it. The nullity of any act inconsistent with the Constitution is produced by the declaration that the Constitution is the supreme law. The appropriate application of that part of the clause which confers the same supremacy on laws and treaties is to such acts of the State Legislatures as do not transcend their powers, but though enacted in the execution of acknowledged State powers, interfere with or are contrary to the laws of Congress made in pursuance of the Constitution, or some treaty made under the authority of the United States. In every such case the act of Congress or the treaty is supreme; and the law of the States, though enacted in the exercise of powers not controverted, must yield to it.

* * * * * * *

Powerful and ingenious minds, taking as postulates that the powers expressly granted to the Government of the Union are to be contracted by construction into the narrowest possible compass, and that the original powers of the States are retained, if any possible construction will retain them, may, by a course of well-digested but refined and metaphysical reasoning founded on these premises, explain away the Constitution of our country, and leave it a magnificent structure indeed to look at, but totally unfit for use. They may so entangle and perplex the understanding as to obscure principles which were before thought quite plain, and induce doubts where, if the mind were to pursue its own course, none would be perceived. In such a case it is peculiarly necessary to recur to safe and fundamental principles to sustain those principles, and, when sustained, to make them the tests of the arguments to be examined.

And if any further reasons should be needed to show how unwise would be the admission of the supremacy of the police power of the State over the constitutional power of Congress to pass an act not only regulating commerce, but prohibiting any interference therewith by the police power of a State, I need only to quote from the opinion of Justice Catron in the License cases, as follows:

What, then, is the assumption of the State court? Undoubtedly, in effect, that the State had the power to declare what should be an article of lawful commerce in the particular State; and having declared that ardent spirits and wines were deleterious to morals and health, they ceased to be commercial commodities there, and that then the police power attached, and consequently the powers of Congress could not interfere. The exclusive State power is made to rest, not on the fact of the state or condition of the article, nor that it is property usually passing by sale from hand to hand, but on the declaration found in the State laws, and asserted as the State policy, that it shall be excluded from commerce. And by this means the sovereign jurisdiction in the State is attempted to be created in a case where it did not previously exist.

If this be the true construction of the constitutional provision, then the paramount power of Congress to regulate commerce is subject to a very material limitation; for it takes from Congress, and leaves with the States, the power to determine the commodities, or articles of property, which are the subjects of lawful commerce. Congress may regulate, but the States determine what shall or shall not be regulated.

Upon this theory the power to regulate commerce, instead of being paramount over the subject, would become subordinate to the State police power; for it is obvious that the power to determine the articles which may be the subjects of commerce, and thus to circumscribe its scope and operation, is, in effect, the controlling one. The police power would not only be a formidable rival but, in a struggle, must necessarily triumph over the commercial power, as the power to regulate is dependent upon the power to fix and determine upon the subjects to be regulated.

And, in conclusion:

That any State law whose provisions are repugnant to the existing regulations of Congress (within the above limit) is void, so far as it is opposed to the legislation of Congress.

That the police power of the States was reserved to the States, and that it is beyond the reach of Congress; but that such police power extends to articles only which do not belong to foreign commerce, or to commerce among the States at the time the police power is exercised in regard to them; and that the fact of their condition is a subject proper for judicial ascertainment.

That the power to regulate commerce among the States may be exercised by Congress at pleasure, and the States cut off from regulating the same commerce at the same time it stands regulated by Congress; but that, until such regulation is made by Congress, the States may exercise the power within their respective limits.

The distinction must be borne in mind by this House between that feature of the police power of the State which comes into exercise after such freights deemed dangerous to the public health may have arrived within the borders of the State, and that provision of the Constitution which gives authority to Congress to regulate such freights while in transitu. I do not maintain for one moment that after freights or passengers shall have become situated within the State, and under the control of the police power, they may not be excluded on the ground of public safety. This view of the case is sustained by the opinion rendered by Justice Woodbury in the License cases, from which I quote the following:

It is possible that under our system of double governments over one and the same people the States cannot prohibit the mere arrival of vessels and cargoes which they may deem dangerous in character to their public peace or public morals or general health. This might perhaps trench on foreign commerce. Nor can they tax them as imports. This might trench on that part of the Constitution which forbids States to lay duties on imports. But after articles have come within the territorial limits of States, whether on land or water, the destruction itself of what contains disease and death, and the longer continuance of such articles within their limits, or the terms and conditions of their continuance, when conflicting with their legitimate police, or with their power over internal commerce, or with their right of taxation over all persons and property under their protection and jurisdiction, seems one of the first principles of State sovereignty and indispensable to public safety.

I do not deem it necessary to refer to the case of Lemmon vs. The People, (20 New York Reports,) which further sustains the position already taken: that during the voyage or trip Congress has the power of regulation over passengers; when the trip ceases and they come under the jurisdiction of the State, then the State laws must prevail. In the case of The United States vs. Holliday (3 Wallace) the opinion of the court goes to show that commerce could even be regulated within the limits of the State if such commerce should be with an Indian tribe. In their opinion, quoting from Chief-Justice Marshall, they say:

The power does not stop at the jurisdictional limits of the several States. It would be a very useless power if it could not pass those lines. If Congress has power to regulate it that power must be exercised wherever the subject exists. It follows from these propositions, which seem to be incontrovertible, that if commerce, or traffic, or intercourse is carried on with an Indian tribe, or with a member of such tribe, it is subject to be regulated by Congress, although within the limits of a State. The locality of the traffic can have nothing to do with the power. The right to exercise it in reference to any Indian tribe or any person who is a member of such tribe is absolute without reference to the locality of the traffic or the locality of the tribe or of the member of the tribe with whom it is carried on.

In connection with this subject, which is of such grave importance to the people at large, my attention has been particularly called to the inadequacy and inefficiency of local quarantines. They are established in times of imminent danger, when rules and regulations are framed by persons in the community whose minds are excited by the dire results of an approaching epidemic, and they are hardly fit under such a mental strain to wisely and calmly enact rules looking to their own safety and protection.

Another consideration, and one of moment, is the fact that in the South the means are often wanting to pay the officers and to provide those precautions necessary in the case of an epidemic. That this subject should properly and justly come under the jurisdiction of the United States Government cannot, I think, be for one moment denied. The public health of the country is a matter of the gravest importance. Congress in its wisdom has seen fit to make an appropriation of $500,000 and to place a major portion of this amount under the direct control of the National Board of Health. The sentiment of Congress was almost unanimous on the subject that some action should be taken by the Government looking to future protection from the ravages of the fearful scourge of yellow fever; and, in due consideration of the importance of maintaining the commerce between the States unrestricted by local quarantines framed by incompetent persons, I am of the opinion that such a provision as is provided in the bill referred to should be enacted into a law, that the business interests of the country may not meet with financial ruin before the desolating blasts of epidemics like those of 1878 and 1879.

I have attempted to present both the legal and utilitarian view of this subject. It is an important question, both from a constitutional and commercial stand-point. The public health as well as the business interests of the country demand some congressional action. This great nation should not be fettered with ante bellum traditions. We cannot unlock the portal of our country's future greatness with the rusted key of past ideas.

The following petition has been numerously signed by leading business and railroad men of the country; some are appended.

APPENDIX A.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners respectfully represent to your honorable body that the facts connected with the yellow-fever epidemic of 1878 demonstrated so clearly that the public interest of the country required some national legislation on the subject of the public health that Congress established the National Board of Health, with an ample appropriation.

Yellow fever prevailed so generally in the South in 1878 and its ravages were so destructive to both life and the business interests of that section that on its reappearance in 1879, in Memphis, quarantines of a most rigid character were everywhere established. So great and widespread was the alarm that many places entirely free from infection were quarantined by others on mere suspicion. Railroad trains filled with passengers traveling from State to State, and other trains loaded with the produce of the country and the necessaries of life, would be notified on the point of starting that they could not pass through such and such a place, as the local board of health had established a shot-gun quarantine. Many travelers away from home were debarred from returning by intervening quarantines, and small towns were often cut off from their base of supplies by the action of the local board of health of some intermediate village, and there were instances where trains with physicians, nurses, and medicines, en route to some infected place were stopped and sent back, so intense was the fear of infection, and so unreasonable did some communities become in the general alarm.

The country which suffered so dreadfully in 1878 with the fever itself was now threatened by a different danger, but one almost as great—the destruction of commerce and intercourse, and the attendant financial ruin of the business interests of the country. Every incorporated town or village claimed the right to regulate its quarantine as it deemed best, and these regulations, based upon no uniformity of rule, were generally enlarged or restricted according to the fears or necessities of its inhabitants. The great trunk lines in the South, carrying interstate freights and passengers, were forced to struggle against these local quarantines as best they could, while passengers, passing from one State to another, had no guarantee that, though certified as free from any infection by the first several local quarantines, they would not be stopped at the next.

Satisfied that the very existence of the country's commercial interests, particularly in the South, required some uniformity in quarantine regulations, and that they should not be left to the fears or prejudices of any one locality, a convention was called in Nashville, Tennessee, during the month of November, 1879, when the following resolutions were read and adopted:

"Whereas the experience of the years 1878 and 1879 has shown that in times of excitement and great fear, the people living in localities that are or may become subject to infectious or contagious disease are rendered unfit to frame rules and regulations and modes for its arrest, prevention, and spread, and that the fears of each community induce them to prescribe only such course as may be deemed sufficient for their own individual protection, without reference to for consideration for the rights and safety of others, it has become a necessity that the general preservation of the public health be now delegated to some power capable of devising the best plans and modes for its protection; and

"Whereas it is believed that the General Government, which is and should be administered for the common benefit of the whole country, should enact laws, as far as the same can be done, for the conservation of the public health, and to promote the material prosperity of the nation, dependent entirely upon interstate as upon foreign commerce: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the representatives of the several railroads, assembled in convention, do most respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to charge the National Board of Health with the sole power of making and carrying into effect such rules and regulations as to them shall be deemed wise and proper to govern interstate commerce, affecting the transportation of passengers and merchandise on railroads and on steamboats or other craft plying on lakes and rivers between and through States or Territories where any contagious or infectious disease does or may exist.

"Resolved, Your petitioners respectfully suggest that, in order to secure promptness and efficiency to prevent the spread of any infectious or contagious disease, the president of the National Board of Health, the Surgeon-General of the United States, and the president of the State board of health, or the members of the National Board of Health from the State where such disease exists, should constitute an executive committee, with power to act and put in force quarantine rules and regulations for governing the transportation of passengers and merchandise. It is believed that, by delegating this power to the persons above named, more prompt action can be secured than would otherwise be the case if the whole board of health had to be called together to devise such measures. Sudden emergencies must be met by quick and decisive action; the details necessary to make the system adopted work smoothly and harmoniously can afterward be arranged as circumstances may require. Where so great a matter as the public health of the country is at stake, no clashing should be allowed between national and State authority. There should be no bickerings, abstract theories, or professional courtesies permitted to prejudice by delays such great objects as the public health and the material prosperity of the country, the latter so greatly depending on the former.

"Resolved, That wherever said National Board of Health deems it necessary to put such quarantine regulations into force, it shall designate what class of merchandise (if any) may be transported to or from or through such infected place, district, State, or Territory, and prescribe all such rules, regulations, and provisions under which such transportation may be made.

"Resolved, That when said National Board of Health establishes quarantine regulations, it shall designate stations or points upon such railways, rivers, and lakes as it shall consider necessary for conducting an effective system of inspection of such passengers or merchandise, and making provision for caring for sick persons as the interests of the general public health and safety shall require; and the rules and regulations adopted by the authority of the National Board of Health shall be enforced by such agents, officers, and servants as may be charged with the sanitary inspection of such stations or points.

"Resolved, That when such inspection shall have been made such passengers, with their personal effects, and such merchandise as may be found entitled to it, shall be furnished with a certificate that shall be their passport to point of destination, and they shall not be detained or prosecuted by any intermediate regulations of any town, city, county, or State from passing through the same.

"Resolved, That whenever any passenger shall be refused a certificate setting forth that he is free from contagious or infectious disease, such passenger may be detained at such station until his condition shall entitle him to receive a clean bill of health; and he shall not be permitted to proceed beyond such point of inspection until there is a reasonable certainty that such person is not likely to be the vehicle of contagious or infectious disease.

"Resolved, That whenever any merchandise in transit from any infected place shall, in the judgment of the inspector of the National Board of Health, be deemed unsafe and likely to convey contagious or infectious disease to any point, such merchandise, on the order of the sanitary inspector, shall be disinfected before it is allowed to proceed.

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be requested to appropriate such sum or sums of money annually as may be necessary to enable the Board of Health to provide the means for effectively carrying out its provisions in the interest of the public health.

"Resolved, That the said National Board of Health shall determine when any place shall be declared infected with contagious or infectious disease, and when such disease has ceased to exist, and shall give public notice of the same."

By the adoption of uniform and intelligent quarantine regulations, carriers and transporting companies will be enabled to co-operate with and render aid to the National Board of Health in arresting and preventing the spread of any contagious or infectious disease along the routes of highway traversed by such carrying and transporting companies, who, in common with the inhabitants of such routes, have a direct interest in promoting the general good health and prosperity of the whole people.

"Resolved, Your petitioners most respectfully suggest to your honorable body that they believe it will meet the approval of all good citizens and tax-payers of the United States if the National Government will take the matter of the public health under its fostering care and supervision, and enact such laws and make such appropriations as a careful and honest expenditure of the public treasure will warrant."

Your petitioners believe, by these means, not only will the public health be protected, but the prosperity of all communities be increased by the assurance given to uninterrupted communications between all parts of a common country under such precautions as the dictates of wisdom and humanity may suggest.

Your petitioners further believe that the great and paramount object to be attained—the public health of the country—can be largely secured under wise laws enacted for this purpose, and that such expenditures as may be involved in making and executing the same will not be a burden seriously felt by the national Treasury.

By your honorable body enacting such laws and providing for their maintenance and efficiency, which we believe will go far toward accomplishing the desired end, your petitioners will ever feel in duty bound to pray.

Your petitioners therefore respectfully pray that, as a bill (H. R. No. 3115) known as the "Acklen interstate quarantine bill" is now before your honorable body for consideration, and that as its provisions tend in everywise to harmonize existing difficulties by establishing uniformity, as well as thoroughness, in quarantine rules of inspection and certification, by delegating such power to a body removed from any local fear or prejudice, your honorable body will enact the same into a law; and for this and all other and general relief your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

WAR DEPARTMENT, SURGEON-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 2, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of December 25, 1879, inclosing copy of a bill (H. R. No. 3045) and requesting suggestions with regard to the same.

In reply I would respectfully suggest that as the Medical Departments of the United States Army and Navy are each represented in the present National Board of Health and in its executive committee, it would seem preferable to place the carrying out of the provisions of the bill in the hands of the executive committee of the National Board of Health, and not to bring the Surgeon-General of the Army or of the Navy into the matter.

I am of the opinion that the present National Board of Health is so far satisfactory in its organization and in the plan of its operations that it does not need any such additions to its membership as is contemplated by the bill to secure the satisfactory execution of any duties of this kind which may be imposed upon it.

In this connection, also, I would suggest the omission of section 5 of the bill, as seeming to imply that there is special danger that the board or the executive committee would disobey or be negligent in executing the law. Such danger, in my opinion, does not exist.

The object which the bill seeks to attain is certainly desirable, being in the interests of commerce as well as of the public health.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. K. BARNES,
Surgeon-General.

Hon. J. H. ACKLEN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have transmitted a copy of your bill, with such memorandum as remembered of your conference with the executive committee of the other evening, to Dr. James L. Cabell, president of the National Board of Health, and for your information upon this matter I herewith respectfully inclose extracts from his comments upon the bill which have been addressed to me.

I shall look with some degree of concern upon the progress of your amended bill, and trust that you will favor me with copies of all the amendments that may be suggested by members of Congress interested in its fate.

I have to thank you for your extended courtesies, and am, sir,

Very respectfully,
T. J. TURNER,
Secretary National Board of Health.

Hon. JOSEPH H. ACKLEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, January 13, 1880.

MY DEAR SIR: May I beg the favor of you, if convenient, to furnish me with a copy of your bill, in regard to which you addressed a communication to the National Board of Health on the 25th ultimo. That communication, with the accompanying bill, was sent to me for my information by Dr. Turner, secretary of the board; but as in the intervals of the session of the board the executive committee and not the president of the board is charged with the duty and responsibility of acting for the board, I returned these papers immediately, with a brief and hurried statement of the objections which presented themselves to my mind, a statement intended, of course, for the executive committee, though with permission to recite them to you for your consideration. Whether this has been done I am not certainly informed, and as I am now addressing you for another purpose, will you pardon me for again referring to those objections? This I do unofficially, as I have no authority to make an official statement except by order of the board or of its executive committee. I sympathize so warmly in the objects you desire to attain that I feel impelled to indicate the objections which will be made by a number of members who in the main are disposed to assist the National Board of Health in its efforts to prevent the introduction and spread of infectious diseases without unnecessary interference with travel and traffic.

The fate of Senator HARRIS's first bill, with the objections urged by its opponents, who constituted a majority of the Senate, leaves scarcely a room for doubt, I should think, that your bill will have no chance in that body. It will, I am confident, encounter earnest opposition from Mr. TUCKER and Mr. GOODE in the House of Representatives, as being in conflict with their recorded views as to the decisions of the Supreme Court, especially in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 1, as delivered by Chief-Justice Marshall.

It seems to me that, in view of this decision, our only hope of attaining the very desirable end sought by the railroad authorities who have petitioned Congress, is to appeal to the States concerned, and to induce them to adopt a uniform system of regulations and to enforce them by uniform and appropriate legislation. This I know will be a slow and difficult process, but it is not altogether hopeless, especially as the concurrence of the States may be made a condition of their receiving aid from the General Government through the instrumentality of the National Board of Health.

There was one clause in your bill, the precise phraseology of which I cannot now recall, and this makes me desirous of having a copy, which, as I hastily read it, seemed to me to expose the board, or its officers, to the risk of being greatly annoyed by suits for damages in cases in which the aggrieved parties might choose to ascribe the successful interference of the State authorities to a failure on the part of the national health authorities to do their duty, thus placing the latter in the unpleasant dilemma of incurring a legal responsibility toward the shippers and consignees of freight, or else of having a conflict with State or municipal authorities. Such a conflict would be very detrimental to the true interests of sanitation which are only to be attained by harmonious action between the national and the local authorities.

With the utmost respect and deference I submit these views to your consideration, again reminding you that they are presented only as my personal opinions, and that I am not at all authorized to speak for the National Board of Health.

I am, very respectfully, yours,
J. L. CABELL.

P. S.—After this letter was written I have received by this day's mail from Dr. Turner, a copy of your amended bill, which entirely removes the ground of my second objection. The constitutional difficulty referred to in the first objection will I fear still be urged. I accordingly submit it for your consideration.

Very respectfully and truly, yours,
J. L. C.

Hon. JOSEPH H. ACKLEN,
House of Representatives.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. HENRY POEHLER,

OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. POEHLER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: There are two principal questions involved in the proposition before us, and I am glad that one of them has been settled to my satisfaction, and that is the question of interest, whereby the burden of taxation of the people is lessened. I care not so much for the time these bonds shall run. It has been argued by a number of gentlemen on this floor that we must pay off this debt in a few years, as though the people had the money lying idle and ready to pay it at almost a moment's notice.

Mr. Chairman, money now is cheap, and we can make a loan at a low rate of interest. It is doubtful if this state of things will exist for a long time; and if it does it will be so much better for this country. We should not hasten too much with the payment of the debt without consulting the condition of affairs of the country. We have drawn more money from the people than they were able to pay without great hardships to many of them, who earned but little; and of these small earnings they had to pay a very large portion to the Government. This was the case at least for a number of years, and now that the financial affairs of this country are in such a prosperous condition, we should take advantage of it, and not place ourselves in such a position that we must meet these bonds in a few years when times may be hard. Let us make them redeemable at a short time, if you please, but not payable, except at the pleasure of the Government, until from fifteen to twenty years.

I am not in favor of perpetuating our national debt beyond a period that is absolutely necessary, but I am unwilling to tax the people beyond their ability to pay, to compel the individual to mortgage his home and property at high rates of interest so that the Government may pay off the national debt in as short a time as possible.

Mr. Chairman, we all have seen the time, not long since, when a large portion of the people of this country were in a poor condition to pay the burden imposed upon them, and many suffered in want, and lost hearths and home, and not the least cause for much of this suffering was the enormous burden imposed upon the people by our high tariff for the support of the Government and to enrich the manufacturers; and I think it is time the burden should be reduced, and this can be done by paying a low rate of interest.

Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that a bond drawing 3 per cent. interest can be sold at par, and it would be criminally wrong to pay a fraction more. These bonds are not taxed for any purpose, and a low rate of interest is the only way that the holders of them can be reached, and that will benefit the whole country even more than taxing them would do.

Interstate Commerce.

SPEECH OF HON. COLUMBUS UPSON,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 11, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4748) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. UPSON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Gravely doubting the wisdom and practicability of national legislation as to the transportation of interstate commerce, particularly, as Congress cannot extend its jurisdiction to the vast amount of transportation carried on wholly within each State, and, more particularly, as to the proposed legislation, which is not to be applied to water transportation, thereby failing to establish by law a uniform and equitable system of transportation for the whole country, yet, conceding that under the constitutional power to regulate commerce among the several States, Congress has the authority to regulate the transportation thereof as between the States, and if we concede that there is a great public necessity for the exercise of such authority, it then becomes the duty of Congress, so far as may be done, to establish such regulations as will bring about a just, practical, and uniform system of interstate commerce transportation.

Two modes are suggested—one by the original bill, and the other by the substitute now under consideration. The system proposed by the original bill is for the Government, through its officers, to be styled a Board of Commissioners, to take and exercise supervisory control over the transportation of commerce between the States, while the substitute proposes to regulate such transportation by the enactment of certain prohibitory and compulsory rules.

If these great corporate powers—railroad companies—as is charged, have so far obtained control over the State governments as to set at defiance local authorities, and avoid being prevented by State laws and State tribunals from an unjust, oppressive, and destructive exercise of their franchises and a corrupt use of their vast wealth, there is but one certain, practical, and effective remedy, and that is for the General Government, by its strong arm, through its officers, clothed with full discretionary power, to take and exercise directory, prohibitory, compulsory, and supervisory control over these bodies as to the transportation of interstate commerce, and thereby compel them to so regulate and conduct their business of transportation between the States as will be just and equitable to all concerned.

With that object in view the original bill is a step in the right direction, and possibly may be perfected into a practical and wise system. It is in harmony with the following resolution adopted by the National Board of Trade in December, 1879:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this board it is desirable to secure national legislation upon interstate commerce by railroad, and that said legislation should embody the following provisions: first, to raise a special commission or tribunal to secure uniformity and publicity in railway accounts, and publicity of railway contracts and transactions; second, to enforce provisions securing uniformity of rates and classifications under like circumstances, and relative quality where circumstances differ; third, to secure publicity of rates and prohibition of sudden and arbitrary changes; fourth, to secure the prevention of extortionate charges, and of personal or local favoritism.

Our statute-books may be filled with the most stringent laws, our enactments may be bristled over with the severest penalties, which may result in filling our court dockets with lawsuits and criminal prosecutions, and in crowding our jails with railroad convicts, but laws alone, without the instruments to put them into practical and effective execution, will not accomplish the object desired.

I confess that I am not prepared to discuss the question as to the regulation of the transportation of interstate commerce, either satisfactorily to myself or as thoroughly as its importance demands. I desire mainly to give some of the prominent reasons, which seem to me unanswerable, why I cannot support the substitute known as the "Reagan interstate-commerce bill;" and, in doing so, I shall take the liberty of quoting from several able arguments made before the House Committee of Commerce.

I am opposed to the Reagan bill upon the following grounds:

First. As I believe, it will destroy, or greatly impair, competition between competing lines of railroads, as well as competition between railroads and water transportation, chiefly at terminal points, such as Chicago, Saint Louis, Atlanta, New Orleans, Kansas City, San Francisco; and in my own State I may mention Galveston, Houston, Austin, San Antonio, Dallas, and Sherman, besides many other places which might be named, constituting the chief central points of interior trade throughout the country, and that thereby, "through freights," from East to West, and from West to East, and from and to Europe, principally for the valley of the Mississippi and the entire country west of the Mississippi River, will be greatly increased, to the injury of the whole people living in those sections.

Second. As it makes a discrimination in favor of water transportation as against transportation by railroads, thereby preventing free competition between those different lines, which will inevitably result in the increased prices of freights to the great detriment of the public.

Third. As it will result in discriminating in favor of and in transferring a large amount of freight to the railroad and water lines of transportation running through Canada and along our borders, to the great benefit of a foreign people, and to the positive injury of our own citizens.

Fourth. As it discriminates against our farmers in the South and great West, by depriving them of cheap transportation and forcing upon them an unequal competition in the sale of their products in the markets of New York and of Europe.

Fifth. As the bill cannot deal with transportation performed wholly within a State it unavoidably makes an unjust discrimination in favor of transportation within the States, where the roads may charge any rate of freight or allow any amount as a drawback or rebate.

Sixth. That it will foster and build up monopolies of trade in the city of New York to the injury of the merchants and people in the interior, and thereby increase the cost of commodities purchased and diminish the prices of articles sold at remote points from the great commercial Emporium—New York.

The following is the full text of the substitute, or Reagan bill, namely:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property by railroad from one State or Territory to or through one or more other States or Territories of the United States, or to or from any foreign country, directly or indirectly to charge to or receive from any person or persons any greater or less rate or amount of freight, compensation, or reward than is charged to or received from any other person or persons for like and contemporaneous service in the carrying, receiving, delivering, storing, or handling of the same. And all persons engaged as aforesaid shall furnish, without discrimination, the same facilities for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of all property of like character carried by him or them, and shall perform with equal expedition the same kind of services connected with the contemporaneous transportation thereof as aforesaid. No break, stoppage, or interruption, nor any contract, agreement, or understanding, shall be made to prevent the carriage of any property from being and being treated as one continuous carriage, in the meaning of this act, from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless such stoppage, interruption, contract, arrangement, or understanding was made in good faith for some practical and necessary purpose, without any intent to avoid or interrupt such continuous carriage, or to evade any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property, as aforesaid, directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage, in any form, upon shipments made or services rendered, as aforesaid, by him or them.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the carriage, receiving, storage, or handling of property, as mentioned in the first section of this act, to enter into any combination, contract, or agreement, by changes of schedule, carriage in different cars, breaking car-loads into less than car-loads, or by any other means, with intent to prevent the carriage of such property from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination, whether carried on one or several railroads. And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons carrying property, as aforesaid, to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination for the pooling of freights, or to pool the freights, of different and competing railroads, by dividing between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion of them.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property, as provided in the first section of this act, to charge or receive any greater compensation per car-load of similar property for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same for a shorter than for a longer distance in one continuous carriage; and the road of a corporation shall include all the road in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated under a contract or lease by such corporation.

SEC. 5. That all persons engaged in carrying property, as provided in the first section of this act, shall adopt and keep posted up schedules, which shall plainly state:

First, the different kinds and classes of property to be carried.

Second, the different places between which such property shall be carried.

Third, the rates of freight and prices of carriage between such places, and for all services connected with the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, storing, or handling the same.

Such schedules may be changed from time to time as hereinafter provided. Copies of such schedules shall be printed in plain, large type, at least the size of ordinary pica, and shall be kept plainly posted for public inspection in at least two places in every depot where freights are received or delivered; and no such schedule shall be changed in any particular except by the substitution of another schedule containing the specifications above required, which substitute schedule shall plainly state the time when it shall go into effect, and copies of which, printed as aforesaid, shall be posted, as above provided, at least five days before the same shall go into effect; and the same shall remain in force until another schedule shall, as aforesaid, be substituted. And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in carrying property on railroads as aforesaid, after thirty days after the passage of this act, to charge or receive more or less compensation for the carriage, receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, or storing of any of the property contemplated by the first section of this act, than shall be specified in such schedule as may at the time be in force.

SEC. 6. That each and all of the provisions of this act shall apply to all property, and the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of the same, on one actually or substantially continuous carriage, or as part of such continuous carriage, as provided for in the first section of this act, and the compensation therefor, whether such property be carried wholly on one railroad or partly on several railroads, and whether such services are performed or compensation paid or received by or to one person alone or in connection with another or other persons.

SEC. 7. That each and every act, matter or thing in this act declared to be unlawful is hereby prohibited; and in case any person or persons, as defined in this act, engaged as aforesaid, shall do, suffer, or permit to be done, any act, matter or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or shall omit to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or shall be guilty of any violation of the provisions of this act, such person or persons shall forfeit and pay to the person or persons who may sustain damage thereby a sum equal to three times the amount of the damages so sustained, to be recovered by the person or persons so damaged, by suit in any district or circuit court of the United States where the person or persons causing such damage can be found, or may have an agent, office, or place of business: Provided, however, That in any such case of recovery the damages shall not be assessed at a less sum than $500; and the person or persons so offending shall for each offense forfeit and pay a penalty of not less than $1,000, to be recovered by the United States, by action in any circuit or district court aforesaid, one-half of such penalty or penalties, when collected, to be paid to the informer.

Any action to be brought as aforesaid to recover any such penalty or damages may be considered, and if so brought shall be regarded, as a subject of equity jurisdiction and discovery, and affirmative relief may be sought and obtained therein. In any such action so brought as a case of equitable cognizance, preliminary or final injunctions may, without allegation or proof of damage to any plaintiff or complainant, be granted upon proper application, restraining, forbidding, and prohibiting the commission or continuance of any acts, matters, or things, within the terms or purview of this act, prohibited or forbidden. In any action aforesaid, and upon any application for any injunction above provided for, any director, officer, receiver, or trustee of any corporation or company aforesaid, or any receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or any agent of any such corporation or company, receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or of any of them alone or with any other person or persons, party or parties, may and shall be compelled to attend, appear, and testify and give evidence; and no claim that any such testimony or evidence might or might not tend to criminate the person testifying or giving evidence shall be of any avail, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used as against such person on the trial of any indictment against him. The attendance and appearance of any of the persons who as aforesaid may be compelled to appear or testify, and the giving of the testimony or evidence by the same, respectively, and the production of books and papers thereby, may and shall be compelled, the same as in the case of any other witness; and in case any such deposition or evidence, or the production of any books or papers, may be desired or required for the purpose of applying for or sustaining any injunction aforesaid, the same, and the production of books and papers, may and shall be had, taken, and compelled, by or before any United States commissioner, or in any manner provided or to be provided for, as to the taking of other depositions or evidence, or the attendance of witnesses, or the production of other books or papers, in or by chapter 17 of title 13 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. In actions to be brought as aforesaid, damages sustained in the period of a month or part of a month may be regarded as and counted or declared upon, or complained of generally, and as one separate cause of action, and so whether such damages be sustained in one month or in different months; and such separate causes of action may be joined in the same action. No action aforesaid shall be sustained unless brought within one year after the cause of action shall accrue. And any judgment, under the provisions of this act, shall be rendered against the person or persons violating its provisions and against the corporation or corporations in whose service or under whose authority they perform such unlawful acts.

SEC. 8. That any director or officer of any corporation or company acting or engaged as aforesaid, or any receiver or trustee, lessee, or person acting or engaged as aforesaid, or any agent of any such corporation or company, receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or of one of them alone, or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, who shall directly or indirectly do, or cause or willingly suffer or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or directly or indirectly aid or abet therein, or shall directly or indirectly omit or fail to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or cause or willingly suffer or permit any act, matter, or thing so directed or required to be done not to be so done, or shall directly or indirectly aid or abet any such omission or failure, or shall directly or indirectly be guilty of any infraction of this act, or directly or indirectly aid or abet therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than one thousand dollars.

SEC. 9. That nothing in this act shall apply to the carriage, receiving, storage, handling, or forwarding of property less than an ordinary car-load, or wholly within one State, and not shipped from or destined to some foreign country or other State or Territory; nor shall it apply to property carried for the United States at lower rates of freight and charges than for the general public, or to the transportation of articles free or at reduced rates of freight for charitable purposes, or to or from public fairs and expositions for exhibition.

SEC. 10. That the words "person or persons" as used in this act, except where otherwise provided, shall be construed and held to mean person or persons, officer or officers, corporation or corporations, company or companies, receiver or receivers, trustee or trustees, lessee or lessees, agent or agents, or other person or persons acting or engaged in any of the matters and things mentioned in this act.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers."

It will be seen that this bill prohibits any "drawbacks," "rebates," pooling, or the charging of any greater compensation for a shorter than for a longer distance in one continuous carriage, under any circumstances, and prescribes, as I believe, unreasonable and impracticable rules as to scheduling and posting of the rates of freight, &c.

The following is the original or Henderson bill as proposed to be amended by me:

A bill to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That a board of commissioners of interstate commerce is hereby established as a bureau of the Interior Department, to consist of three commissioners, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The President shall, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, appoint said three commissioners, who shall hold their offices for the term of two, four, and six years, from the 1st day of July next thereafter, respectively, as designated in their commissions; and a commissioner shall be appointed as aforesaid before the 1st day of July in each second year thereafter, to continue in office for the term of six years from that day, and in the same manner any of said commissioners may be removed; and if a vacancy shall occur at any time by resignation, removal, or otherwise, a commissioner shall be appointed, as aforesaid, to fill such vacancy for the residue of the term. The action of a majority of said board shall be the action of the board.

SEC. 2. The annual salary of said commissioners shall be $5,000 each, payable quarterly. Said board shall have a clerk, whose duty it shall be to keep a full and faithful record of the proceedings of said board, and otherwise to assist the members thereof in the performance of their duties, and who shall receive an annual salary of $2,500; and also one accountant, at an annual salary of $2,500, each payable monthly. Said clerk and accountant shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, who may also furnish the board of commissioners such additional clerical, engineering, expert, or other service as they may request and he shall deem proper. All actual and necessary traveling and other expenses incurred by said commissioners or their employés, under their orders, shall be allowed them, for which itemized vouchers shall be rendered.

SEC. 3. That said board shall exercise a supervision over that portion of the business of all railroads which passes from one State or Territory into or through one or more other States or Territories, or to or from any foreign country, and over the transportation of all property by railroad from one State or Territory into or through one or more other States or Territories, or to or from any foreign country, whether such property be carried by one railroad or by several railroads running in connection with each other, and whether such commerce be carried on railroads lying wholly within one State or more. But such supervision shall be limited to questions of commerce between the States, and the methods of operating railroads, to extend to and include, at the discretion of said board, the power of regulating, controlling, and prohibiting drawbacks, rebates, and pooling, and the establishing, making, changing, altering, and modifying of the rates of tariff, toll, or compensation, to be charged and paid, with the scheduling, posting, and advertising of the same, by railroad corporations, as affecting said commerce.

SEC. 4. Said board shall prescribe a railroad year, and a system of reports covering said year, to be rendered by all railroad companies hereinbefore described; examine the books and accounts of said companies in any manner affecting the said commerce between the States, at such times as may be deemed by them necessary; see that all United States laws relating to said companies are enforced, furnish such information to the several Departments of the Government, or the Government directors of any of said railroads, in regard to the tariff of fares and freight on such business, or the accounts as aforesaid of said railroads, as may be required of them or as they may deem expedient, and make annual reports of their doings to the Secretary of the Interior on or before the 1st day of November of each year, and other, wise endeavor to procure such data and recommend such legislation as may be deemed necessary to establish a just and practical system of interstate railroad commerce.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of said board to investigate all complaints which may be forwarded to it of any unreasonable charges, or of discriminations in the charges, made for its services as a common carrier in commerce between the States by any railroad corporation or corporations; such investigation shall be made by one or more commissioners on the spot where such cause of complaint originated, or wherever else it may be found most convenient; and the results of all such investigations, and the findings of the commissioners thereon, shall be reported in writing to the parties thereto, and included in the next annual report of the board.

SEC. 6. That whenever it shall appear to said board that any change is necessary or expedient in the manner in which any railroad corporation, organization, or person conducts it or his business as a common carrier between the States in order to promote the public interests they shall give notice thereof in writing to said corporation, organization, or person, with a statement of such changes as they adjudge to be proper, which changes shall be complied with by such corporation, organization, or person within a reasonable time after such notice, and any refusal or neglect to comply with such recommendations shall be deemed a violation of this act.

SEC. 7. That whenever in the judgment of said board it shall appear that any corporation, organization, or person owning or operating any railroad or other means of transportation has violated any law of the United States relating to said railroad organization or person, or has in any respect or particular neglected to comply with the terms of any such law, or that any person or corporation or organization has violated or neglected to comply with any of the terms of this act, they shall give notice thereof in writing to such person, organization, or corporation, and they may present the facts to the Attorney-General of the United States, who (if so instructed by said board) shall institute such proceedings thereon against said corporation, organization, or person as may be herein or otherwise by law authorized.

SEC. 8. That said board of commissioners, in any investigation conducted by or before them, shall have power to summon witnesses and to direct the production of books, papers, contracts, and reports relating to any subject-matter of complaint or alleged violation of the provisions of this act; and in case any person so summoned shall fail or refuse to appear or to produce any books, papers, contracts, or reports which may be called for as aforesaid, the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, contracts, and reports, in so far as they relate to the questions and business referred to in this act may, on application of said board, be compelled by or before any United States commissioner, as in civil cases depending in district or circuit courts of the United States, in the manner provided in chapter 17 of title 13 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and such investigations as aforesaid, in which the commissioners may direct the production of books, papers, contracts, and reports, shall be conducted when practicable at the place where the general office of the corporation owning said books, papers, contracts, or reports may be situate.

SEC. 9. That no company or companies, railroad corporation or corporations, organization or organizations, person or persons so engaged as aforesaid in operating a line or lines of railroad, shall charge, collect, demand or receive more than a fair and reasonable rate of toll or compensation for the transportation of freight or property of any kind or description, or for the use and transportation of any railroad-car upon its track, to be carried from one State or Territory to another State or Territory, or to or from any foreign country, in so far as the transportation of such freight and property, or the use and transportation of such railroad-car shall relate to commerce between the States; and for each and every violation of this act, by charging, collecting, demanding, or receiving more than such reasonable rate, the company or companies, railroad corporation or corporations, organization or organizations, person or persons so offending shall be jointly and severally liable for extortion, and subject to the forfeitures and penalities hereinafter provided.

SEC. 10. That no railroad corporation, organization, or persons, whether engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property between the States by railroad, steamboat, canal-boat, or other water-craft, within the purview of this act, shall, directly or indirectly, charge to or receive from any person or persons any greater or less rate or amount of freight charge or compensation than is by them charged to or received from any other person for the same facilities and for like and contemporaneous service under similar circumstances and conditions in the carrying, storing, or handling of the same on or over the same line of transportation, and all such railroad corporations and persons so engaged as aforesaid shall furnish, as nearly as may be, and as may be reasonably within their power, and without discrimination, the same facilities for the carriage, storage, and handling of all property of like character carried by it, him, or them as aforesaid; and shall, as near as reasonably may be, perform with equal expedition the same kind of services connected with the contemporaneous transportation thereof as aforesaid. No break of bulk or interruption, nor any contract or understanding, shall be made to prevent the carriage of any property from being and being treated as one continuous carriage, in the meaning of this act, from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless such stoppage, interruption, contract, or understanding was made in good faith for some practical and necessary purpose, without any intent to avoid or interrupt such continuous carriage, or to evade any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 11. That no person or persons engaged in the transportation of property between the States or otherwise, as aforesaid, shall, directly or indirectly, allow any person any rebate, drawback, or other advantage in any form upon shipments made or services rendered, as aforesaid, by him or them, which are not open and public and under like conditions and for the same contemporaneous service is not allowed to all other persons, nor shall any person or persons for whom such service is done accept or receive such rebate, or drawback, or other advantage in any form, and the penalties provided in this act shall apply to the receiver of such rebate, drawback, or other advantage, as well as to the party paying the same.

SEC. 12. No person or persons engaged in the carriage, storage, or handling of property, as mentioned in the tenth and eleventh sections of this act, shall enter into any combination or agreement the object of which is to prevent, by changes of schedule, carriage in different cars, breaking different car-loads into less than car-loads, or by any other means, the carriage of such property being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination, whether carried on one or several railroads.

SEC. 13. That the provisions of this act shall apply to all interstate commerce and business, as aforesaid, including the carriage, storage, and handling of all property on one actually or substantially continuous interstate carriage, or part of such carriage, as provided for in the tenth and eleventh sections of this act, and the compensation therefor, whether such property be carried wholly on one railroad or partly on several railroads, or wholly on water, or partly on railroad and partly on water, and whether such services are performed or compensation paid or received by or to one person alone or in connection with another or other persons.

SEC. 14. That any corporation or corporations, person or persons, guilty of a violation of any of the provisions of this act shall forfeit and pay to the person or persons who may sustain damage thereby a sum not exceeding three times the amount of the actual damages so sustained, to be recovered by suit in any district or circuit court of the United States where the corporation or corporations, person or persons, causing such damage can be found, or may have an agent or place of business; and the corporation or corporations, organization or organizations, person or persons, so offending shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay for each offense a penalty of not less than $1,000, to be recovered by the United States by action, on information of the commissioners of interstate commerce, or otherwise, in any district or circuit court of the United States, one-half of such penalty, when collected, to be paid to the party damaged by such violation of law, and bringing action thereon, or commencing proceedings by complaint to said commissioners. No action as aforesaid shall be sustained unless brought within one year after the cause of such action shall accrue.

SEC. 15. That nothing in this act shall apply to the carriage, storage, or handling of property less than an ordinary car-load, or wholly within one State or Territory, and not contracted to be carried beyond such State or Territory, or property carried for the United States, or to the transportation of articles free, or at reduced rates, for State or municipal governments, or for charitable, educational, or scientific purposes, or to or from public fairs and expositions for exhibition thereat.

SEC. 16. That in the construction of this act the words "railroad" or "railroads" shall be construed to mean a railroad or all railroads engaged in transporting property from one State or Territory into or through one or more other States or Territories, or into or from any foreign country, whether the same be operated by the corporations owning them or by other corporations or otherwise, and no others. The phrases "railroad corporation" and "railroad company" shall be held to be synonymous, and to signify a corporation which either owns or operates a railroad, as aforesaid. And the term "person or persons," wherever used in this act, shall be held to include corporations and joint-stock companies as well as individuals.

SEC. 17. That the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated for the uses and purposes of this act for the fiscal year ending June 30, A. D. 1882, and the intervening time anterior thereto; and it is expressly provided that no pending litigation between railroad companies shall in any way be affected by the provisions of this act.

This bill provides for a board of commissioners, who shall exercise supervision over railroads as to interstate commerce, with discretionary power to fix the rates of freight, and regulate, control, and prohibit drawbacks, rebates and pooling. It prohibits unfair and unreasonable charges and unjust discriminations; provides for the recovery of damages, for forfeitures, and penalties, for a violation of any of its provisions, or for the violation of any law of the United States by any railroad company, and makes such other provisions as are deemed necessary to accomplish the object of the bill, which is the establishment and operation of a fair, equitable, and practical system of interstate-commerce transportation.

DRAWBACKS AND REBATES.

While, no doubt, some secret and pernicious drawbacks have been allowed by railroad companies to the enrichment of the few and to the impoverishment of the many, which should be condemned and hereafter prevented, I can see many good reasons why open, fair, and public drawbacks or rebates should be allowed to all persons alike.

Mr. Blanchard, in his argument before the House Committee on Commerce, clearly shows the necessity and benefits of drawbacks or rebates. He says:

Lake navigation closes about December 1. The larger coal companies and carriers would not be justified in mining the coal, carrying it and storing it at Buffalo or Erie at the higher rates prevailing in winter, involving loss of interest and deterioration upon the large aggregate delivered.

Furthermore, the equipments provided by the railways could not carry it in sufficient quantities at about the opening of navigation; and to save large additions of cars which would be idle during winter months, to transact the larger annual business with a smaller number of cars, to do so with regularity, and to keep miners more constantly employed, all the railways to the lakes agree that coal sent to their lake docks during the winter months and charged and paid for at the winter rates shall receive a rebate or drawback upon the opening of navigation to make the rate equal to that fixed at such opening. Does not good accrue to every interest from this well-considered action? Yet the proposed act would render it illegal and discriminating. It is true, the act would permit the charge made at the lower through rate, but that would bring all the local winter charges down to the navigation level of summer through rates, without cause or reason.

In further illustration he says:

A manufacturing establishment is erected in New Jersey, contiguous to New York. It desires in each and every month fifty car-loads of supply, and will forward twenty-five of product. To be assured of such quantity and regularity, by which station, train, and other expenses can be regulated with certainty is a valuable railway consideration, and if, after providing facilities upon such assurance, the railway fall materially short of the assured traffic, it would disarrange its plans and increase, rather than decrease, the expenses provided to meet them. A new siding is, for instance, provided, a new storehouse erected, an additional clerk and more laborers required; and to secure the railway for this outlay and at the same time provide a penalty for the non-fulfillment of such an engagement, it has become a wise custom to charge a specific or local rate, and at the end of fixed periods refund to the contracting party an amount justified by the volume and regularity of the traffic, or impose the penalty of withholding the excess in case of his failure to comply with the terms of his agreement. This could still be done on State business, but it would be forbidden on interstate traffic by this act, and would not discrimination thus again ensue? I venture the assertion that a large majority of all the manufacturers of the country would choose such arrangements, establishing fixed rates, a specific contract, and terms of absolute certainty in the transaction of their business, rather than be governed by the fluctuating rates which would practically follow the passage of this act if its provisions were carried out.

* * * * * * *

What mercantile law, what equity, and what necessity render it wise for railways to refuse rebates to these large manufacturing establishments, to enable them to meet the varying conditions of trade, and at the same time to protect the revenues of the carriers against abuse, by holding in their hands cash penalties for their violation until the contracts have been completed? Why single out the transportation interests and eliminate from that interest alone the wholesale or quantity principle which is recognized in every other department of human traffic, and which even the Government justly insists upon in its purchases of arms and ammunition and supplies of all kinds? Does not every other trade make a reduction of its marked or public rates to large purchasers, for cash or superior credit; and are those reductions not varied upon different articles; and is that deemed mercantile discrimination? If, for further example, at any station now upon our line some one and the same person now receives coal, lumber, and lime, and sends away a few car-loads of apples, grain, and miscellaneous barter, and a company with a large capital locates at the same point to make articles requiring the consumption of large and regular receipts of lumber, coal, and lime, and the regular exportation of manufactures, would it be unjust to the former to give the latter a concession by rebate or drawback in consideration of such quantity and regularity?

Would not the interest of the railway and the company be stimulated by a concession to the latter through the establishment of such works, the advance in real estate, and the bringing in of increased population? And if so, what wisdom or mercantile principle can justify a law which forces the carrier to avoid such drawback or rebate?

Again, assuming in store in Buffalo 100,000 bushels of wheat, which could be forwarded by the free canal to New York at eight and a half cents per bushel, but which the railway agreed with the shipper to transport at nine cents per bushel, contingent upon receiving the entire quantity at the rate of twenty-five car-loads per day, and upon condition that it could charge twelve cents per bushel, and refund the three cents upon the fulfillment of the contract. Unless such safeguard had been provided—if freight on the canal had dropped to seven cents per bushel the forwarder might suddenly plead discrimination and combination and give it to the canal, and it is but just to enable the railway to protect itself in the manner indicated. If, upon the fulfillment of the agreement, the three cents per bushel was refunded as a rebate or drawback, in what sense has any harm come to any interest which seeks or desires the protection of this act? Is not this argument unanswerable while the New York Central Railroad and the canal would be free and this company alone amenable to such an act?

Yet, again, if through rates are made in either direction between western points and seaports which can be reached via the Canada Southern, Great Western, or Grand Trunk Railways, between the Niagara and Detroit Rivers, those companies, being within Canadian territory and jurisdiction, can pay rebates and drawbacks out of their proportions of such through rates without hinderance, and 1 per cent. per one hundred pounds, or $2.50 per car-load, will turn the business via their lines and away from the Lake Shore, Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago, Pan-Handle, and Baltimore and Ohio Railroads, to the loss of American interests, because the latter would by this act be prohibited from meeting their action, as a mere reduction of through rates would not do it. Is this justice? The railways can now meet this state of affairs, but this act deliberately permits Canada to take their trade away in that manner, while you tie the hands that would retain and defend it.

Mr. Franklin B. Gowan, president of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, before the same committee stated:

There is no particular objection to the directory clause, that for light and contemporaneous services equal charges should be made to all. But open and public drawbacks, which all shippers can obtain, are not wrong, though a secret drawback given to one shipper and not to another in similar circumstances is not only bad policy but bad law and bad morals. Take a company like our own for example. We ship for consignment beyond the borders of Pennsylvania, say, three millions of tons of coal per annum, and we have to compete with other railroads which are only two-thirds of the distance that we are from the markets taking the coal. We, therefore, make open and public drawback, fully and properly announced, which every shipper to the competitive market can obtain, and such drawbacks are entirely fair and proper, and ought not to be prohibited. If they were prohibited, however, a railroad company by merely publishing several rates to different points could obviate all difficulty imposed by the prohibition. I think it unfair, if not unjust, to prohibit drawbacks of this character. But by the language of this act all drawbacks, whether open and general or special and private, would be equally prohibited.

For instance, we have extensive coal-mines. Our mines are located, say, two hundred miles from New York, while others are from one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and sixty miles; therefore the shorter lines would fix the rate to New York, and if our long line desires to compete with the short line, it must name an equal charge. We must either do that or lose the business; and if you announce the rule of no discrimination in rates, or what in our case would be the same, no drawbacks, the result would be to throw the traffic into the hands of the shorter line, and prevent competition by the longer, unless we should be willing to make the competitive rate to New York govern our entire trade. Because we carry our coal to tide-water at the end of our line, which is within the State, and it is only when the coal is reshipped by vessel that we can tell whether it is entitled to a drawback. We have, as I have said, a large depot at tide-water; the coal goes there by rail, is dumped, and the car comes back. That coal may be afterward shipped to a competitive point, from which it would have been excluded unless carried at a lower rate than we charge for coal to other places; but we cannot name this lower rate when we first get the coal to carry, because it is not until after our railway service is ended and the coal delivered at tide-water and reshipped by vessel that we can tell whether the low rate is applicable to it or not, as the latter depends upon its point of ultimate destination by vessel after it leaves our line. Hence we must adopt the drawback system, which would be prohibited by the bill under consideration by your committee. Now, no one is injured by such drawbacks. They apply to locality, and not to shippers; they are open and public. Each shipper, whether of a hundred tons or a hundred thousand tons to the same locality, gets the same drawback; and if we were forced to discontinue them we should probably be obliged to quit competition with rival lines for the trade of New York. If we abandon competition, we must reduce our output of coal; if we reduce the output, we must increase the cost per ton not only of mining but of carrying, and therefore would be obliged to charge even the local traffic a higher rate than we do now, when we have the advantage of shipping our surplus at lower rates to competitive districts.

RATES FOR LONG AND SHORT DISTANCES.

As to charging more for a short distance than a long one, Mr. Gowan said:

I will take our road as an example. We carry eight millions of tons of coal a year, and of this amount about three millions of tons are carried to a great depot on navigable water, where every facility is afforded for the immediate delivery of the coal and the speedy return of the car. The trip can be made and the car returned in twenty-four hours, and it is no uncommon thing to get three trips a week out of a car running to this depot. We make more money, therefore, out of a car so used than out of one which, although moved a shorter distance, occupies more time in its discharge and return. There must be, therefore, either a charge for the detention of the car or the gross charge for freight must embrace a sum representing the value of the car as an earning power. If we get the most effective use of rolling stock by moving our cars one hundred and twenty miles three times in one week, it is better and more profitable than to move them one hundred miles and only secure one trip a week; and hence, without injustice the charge for the one hundred miles may be greater than the charge for the longer distance. The capital rendered useless by the detention of the cars is something for which compensation should be made to a railroad company.

Mr. J. F. Farnsworth, in discussing the interstate-commerce question before the same committee, said:

The effect of such a law would be reactionary, to put the citizens of remote portions of the country in the condition they were before through lines of railroads were established for the transportation of their products to the seaboard.

The value of the agricultural products of this country—nearly all of them—is regulated by the Liverpool and New York markets, and every discrimination by railroad companies and other common carriers in favor of freights toward those markets is a benefit to the producer; and while this law would be of no appreciable benefit to the "short-stop" freighter, it would take more or less from the price of every bushel of wheat and every pound of beef and pork in the markets of Chicago, Milwaukee, Saint Louis, and all the other principal markets of the West.

In fact, the whole scope of the bill seems to be rather in the interest of the complaining few, the small shippers for short distances, to the prejudice of large shippers for long distances, whose interests are those of the great mass of producers in the country, upon the same principle as would be the requiring the wholesale merchant to sell at retail at the same price that he does at wholesale. Thus, that provision of the bill prohibiting rebates, or drawbacks, and requiring railroad companies to transport a single car-load from one shipper at the same rate that they charge for a hundred car-loads for a single shipper, is clearly unjust.

What damage can it do me, who have but one car-load of goods to transport, that the railroad company, for the sake of getting a large shipment for some other party of a hundred car-loads, may make a special bargain with him and allow him some rebate upon the tariff? So the passage of this law, while it would not benefit me, and I would get my car-load transported no cheaper, would injure the man who has the hundred car-loads to transport; and while the freight upon my single car-load of wheat would have no material effect upon the market price of wheat, the freight upon a hundred car-loads might visibly affect it.

Suppose (what happens almost every year) an immense amount of the productions of the West—grain, cattle, pork—which have to be moved to the seaboard, cars must be supplied to move them. How? They cannot be continually running in one direction; they must be brought back. Fortunately, at the very seasons of the year when these productions are being moved the people of the West want goods—stoves, clothing, hardware, and coal. If the cars can bring a return load, even at very low rates, it helps so much to cheapen the freight upon those productions. The same engines which haul a load east can haul just as large a load west in the same cars. It therefore costs the railroad company but a trifle more to return the cars loaded than empty. The destination of the train in one direction is Baltimore, New York, or Philadelphia; in the other, Chicago, Saint Louis, or Saint Paul. Every car that is dropped from the train at intermediate stations requires the stoppage of another train to pick it up after it is unloaded. The expense of maintaining way stations and this loss of time cannot be incurred for nothing. Besides, it is just as much trouble and expense to settle and collect for the freight on one car-load as a hundred. Under the present system of low through freights hard coal is carried to the great railroad centers of the West so cheaply that people are able to save their groves of timber, and firewood is not worth as much to-day in Chicago as it was twenty-five years ago, prairie country as it is.

POOLING OR CO-OPERATION.

In vindication of the pooling or co-operative system, in regard to which so little is understood and which has been most bitterly denounced, Mr. Albert Fink before the same committee said:

Suppose that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company charges to a shipper, A, forty cents per hundred pounds on grain from Chicago to New York, and the same rate to all its patrons for contemporaneous and like service. It will have strictly complied with the Reagan bill. Suppose, also, that the Pennsylvania Railroad charges on the same day twenty-five cents to another shipper, B, from Chicago to New York, and the same to all its patrons for like and contemporaneous service. Both companies will have strictly complied with the Reagan bill, and yet the shipper A, who may be a next-door neighbor of B, and compete with him in the same article of trade, pays fifteen cents more per hundred pounds than B. The effect of the independent action of these two companies is precisely the same as if one and the same company had made this unjust discrimination.

It certainly can make no difference how discrimination is produced, or by whom it is practiced, as long as it exists.

To prevent this sort of unjust discrimination, it is necessary that the two roads in the case I have mentioned for illustration, and also the other Chicago roads and their connections which can carry this freight to New York, should agree together upon a like charge to be made for contemporaneous and like services to all shippers at Chicago. These several roads should co-operate first in agreeing upon a joint tariff, and then strictly adhere to it. It is only in this way, and in no other, that the shippers in Chicago, or in any one locality where a number of roads compete for the same traffic, can be put upon the same footing, and that the spirit and intention of the common law and the Reagan bill can be practically enforced.

To illustrate this subject still further, suppose the rate from Chicago to New York on grain per hundred pounds is to-day forty cents, while from Saint Louis, upon a strict mileage basis, the rate is forty-five cents. These are the rates actually observed to-day; they are reasonable and just, and do not discriminate between Chicago and Saint Louis, and therefore ought to be, and are, satisfactory to all parties. But suppose the New York Central company charges in Chicago twenty-five cents to-day, while the Saint Louis roads charge forty-five cents in Saint Louis. The Saint Louis shipper would at once complain against this unjust discrimination; but the Reagan bill would afford him no relief and grant him no protection.

In order to secure to the Saint Louis people a non-discriminating tariff—a tariff that will enable them to compete on equal terms with Chicago—there must be an understanding or an agreement, there must be co-operation between the several lines centering in Chicago with the lines centering in Saint Louis in determining the just and proper difference in the tariff from the two cities to the same point of shipment as justified and made necessary by their relative location from the markets and by other commercial considerations; and after the relative tariff is established upon the correct and satisfactory basis, there must be joint and co-operative action in maintaining the same.

Each of the terminal roads in Chicago has a number of connecting roads which reach to the seaboard. Counting the various and distinct combinations of connecting roads with the main roads, there are upward of twenty distinct organizations, working over some fifty different routes to the East, each having separate interests, soliciting business on its own account, and at liberty to make such tariffs as it pleases. A similar state of affairs exists at Saint Louis, from which place freight is shipped over one hundred and seven different routes to the seaboard, controlled by more than twenty different organizations, so that there must be an agreement between upward of forty different interests, all of which must be satisfied as regards the tariff and the amount of business each receives under it, in order to secure the intended object of the Reagan bill: to prevent unjust discrimination. I have only mentioned Chicago and Saint Louis; but you must now also consider that the rates made from these cities influence and control the rates from almost every section of the country, from Indianapolis, Louisville, Cincinnati, Toledo, Detroit, in fact from the lakes down to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean; and further consider, that the co-operation of all the roads interested in the carrying business of this large country is required to regulate and maintain just and proper tariffs; and you may be able to form some idea of the complications and difficulties of the problem, to satisfy the demands of the people for indiscriminating railroad transportation tariffs.

POSTING SCHEDULES OF RATES.

Section 5 of the substitute, as to the posting of schedules, seems impracticable, as is clearly set forth in the remarks of John A. Wright before the Commerce Committee, namely:

If the railway companies should be compelled to carry out the provisions of this bill, they must post a schedule that will embrace every town and every station in the country, covering the possibility of any interstate freight being carried between such stations, otherwise it does not carry out the principle of the bill, and any omission to give such rate in such schedule over its own and connecting roads would render a company liable to the heavy penalties in the bill.

Now, there are about twenty thousand stations in this country, and rapidly increasing in number, and at every station there must be a rate fixed from each station to every other on all freight which can possibly be termed interstate.

You see, gentlemen, that the carrying out of such a provision would be out of the question. It would simply be impracticable.

If it was limited to the road itself it would be a different question. Then, again, this asking a portion of the railroads to put a schedule up for conveyance of freight over other roads, over which it has no control, is impracticable. The first road would be held legally responsible, while roads over which it may be expected that the traffic would pass would decline to make contracts. So the provision is not wise; and anything impracticable, anything that affects the proper interchange of business is, of course, unwise. What you want in railroads, and what you want in all business, is the freest possible movement with the fewest restrictions, so as to keep all the machinery working smoothly and most surely to the end to be reached.

It appears to me that, if the provisions of the substitute were carried out, great monopolies of trade would be built up and fostered in the city of New York to the injury and ruin of merchants in many of our interior cities. To illustrate, take the cities of Chicago and Saint Louis, whose merchants import largely and directly from Europe, their goods passing through the port of New York without there paying tribute. By reason of the facilities of cheap freights, they are enabled to successfully compete in the sale of merchandise with New York and to carry on extensive wholesale trades. If, for example, the railroads running between New York and Saint Louis (from which places freight is shipped over one hundred and seven different routes to the seaboard) charge but a reasonable rate, say $50 for transporting a carload of goods from New York to points, say within two hundred miles east of Saint Louis, should these roads be prohibited from charging considerably less per car for transporting fifty or more carloads from New York to Saint Louis the merchants of Saint Louis would have to abandon their trade with such points east of them, as, to the cost of their goods landed in Saint Louis, there must be added the cost of transportation from Saint Louis back to such eastern points. This would be of no benefit to the community or the merchants at such points east of Saint Louis, but would be a positive injury to them, as it would destroy competition in their trade and force their purchases to be made in New York, when otherwise the Saint Louis merchants could sell to them at lower rates than the New York merchants.

Who, then, is to be benefited by such a provision? Evidently the New York merchants, to the certain injury, not only of the merchants and entire community of Saint Louis and other cities similarly situated, but to the injury of their surrounding communities, now depending upon them for their trade and traffic. It is within the memory of the most of us, when the wholesale mercantile business of the country was carried on by our seaboard cities, mostly by the city of New York, and when wholesale houses in the interior were not known. It has been since the advent, and through the facilities, of railroads that country wholesale houses, removed from our seaboards, have been built up, and they are now successfully carried on in almost every State and Territory of the Union.

While the object sought to be accomplished by the substitute is to relieve and protect the many from the wrongful and unjust encroachments of the few, I am constrained to believe that, if carried out, it will operate to the injury of the many and to the benefit of a favored few. It may kill off a few railroad kings, but over their remains will arise a few princely merchants to amass fabulous fortunes and control the great commercial interests, and perchance the political machinery, of the continent.

As to the people of my own State, depending so much upon long lines of competing railroads for the transportation of their products and merchandise, I confidently believe that the enforcement of the Reagan bill would in the course of a few years, by the increased rates of freight, burden their commerce with millions of dollars of expenses, which, otherwise, would be saved to them and added to their material prosperity.

In our efforts to strike down one unjust monopoly let us take care that we do not build up another less useful and quite as dangerous. In our attempt to regulate the carriage of our vast commerce by railroads, let us beware that we do not stagnate and depopulate many of the growing and thriving cities, villages, towns, and settlements with which railroads have dotted our magnificent domain from our lakes upon the north, and from the Gulf of Mexico upon the south, to the Pacific.

In my judgment, to adopt and enforce the Reagan bill will not only destroy, to a great extent, competition between railroads, and between railroads and water transports, but it will encircle and penetrate our railroad lines, restrained and hampered by fixed rules, with lines of water transportation by Ocean and Gulf, and by Rivers and Lakes, free and unlimited in their rates of transportation, and unrestrained as to "drawbacks," "rebates," and "pooling," of which there is so much complaint.

Competition makes cheap freights, cheap freights make cheap goods, cheap goods bring comfort, contentment, and prosperity to the people. Competition by railroads brings the farmer and stock-raiser of the old States and the farmer and stock-raiser of the far-off West and of the distant frontier, comparatively, upon an equal footing in the markets at home and in the marts of the world. Free, fair, and open competition and rivalry should be permitted and encouraged in all the varied business callings and business transactions of life.

The just regulation of the transportation of commerce is a very great and complicated question, little understood and difficult of solution.

It is a problem which will require the highest order of intelligence, moral courage, and integrity, years of study and experience, with great discretionary powers conferred upon some competent tribunal to work it out, and to mold it into a practical, harmonious, and equitable system. It has baffled the greatest governments and the greatest minds of the world.

The question we are now dealing with, the regulation of the transportation of interstate commerce, under our dual form of government, is much more difficult than the question of the transportation of commerce which for years has engaged the attention of England and France and other European Governments, and many of our State governments; yet, with all their long experience and accumulated wisdom and repeated experiments, they have failed to devise or establish any satisfactory system regulating the transportation of commerce.

It is not within the capacity of any human mind, pigmy or giant, or within the power of any legislative body to lay down a set of arbitrary rules which will be applicable, just, fair, and undiscriminating in all of the innumerable and diversified cases growing out of the transportation of the vast commerce of 50,000,000 of people. Hence the necessity, if we would even approximate a satisfactory, effective, and reasonable system, of a supervisory board clothed with full discretionary power to take charge of this matter and make such regulations from time to time as experience, a thorough study and knowledge of the question, justice, wisdom, and fair dealing may suggest, for the protection and promotion of individual rights and the general good of the public.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. SETH H. YOCUM,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Section 5 of the bill is as follows:

From and after the 1st day of July, 1880, the 3½ per cent. bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation."

For which Mr. CARLISLE had offered the following substitute:

"From and after the 1st day of May, 1881, the 3 per cent. bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation or as security for the safe-keeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with such banks; but when any such bonds deposited for the purposes aforesaid shall be designated for purchase or redemption by the Secretary of the Treasury, the banking association depositing the same shall have the right to substitute other issues of the bonds of the United States in lieu thereof: Provided, That no bond upon which interest has ceased shall be accepted or shall be continued on deposit as security for circulation or for the safe-keeping of the public money; and in case bonds so deposited shall not be withdrawn as provided by law within thirty days after interest has ceased thereon the banking association depositing the same shall be subject to the liabilities and proceedings on the part of the Comptroller provided for in section 5234 of the Revised Statutes of the United States: And provided further, That section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874, entitled 'An act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of the national-bank currency, and for other purposes,' be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and sections 5159 and 5160 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same are hereby, re-enacted."

Mr. YOCUM said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I think there are the most cogent reasons why the provisions of the fifth section of this bill should be retained, at least in substance. The national banks are the creatures of special favors and privileges at the hands of the Government, and are, and of right ought to be, subject to governmental control. It is idle for gentlemen to say that these special privileges amount to nothing. A company of gentlemen, such as compose a bank, may loan the Government the money required to buy one hundred thousand dollars' worth of bonds, and thus far they are on a common level with all other purchasers. But when the Government actually hands them back $90,000 of their investment, so that they are made the possessors of one hundred and ninety thousand dollars' worth of capital, leaving but $10,000 actually invested, and on which investment they receive the interest on $100,000 from the Government and the profits on $90,000 of money in their bank at home, they are indeed made the special favorites of the Government and granted privileges that result in an injury to all the balance of the people. We cannot in a republic afford to raise up a privileged class. It is abhorrent to the spirit of our institutions. Gentlemen say the banks are heavily taxed. Unless they are taxed to an amount equal to the interest either on the bonds or the notes that the Government donates to them, they are still the gainers.

I believe it to be the policy of the advocates of long-time bonds to bridge over, if possible, the present ruling desire to pay off promptly and rapidly the public debt; and if able to do so they will then rely upon building up a sentiment in favor of postponing payment. The permanency and continuation of the national banking system largely depend upon their success in this direction. For with the rapid payment of the public debt must inevitably disappear the foundation of this system of banking and the issuing of its notes as money. The fatal policy of squandering the public moneys in the payment of premiums on its own bonds cannot be defended from any direction. Why not, then, encourage and stimulate the public desire to pay this debt by keeping always within reach of a class of securities that are due and payable? The nation is just now in the strength and vigor of early manhood, and it will add to its industry and energy to make this manly effort to get rid of the burdens of this debt. The postponement of its payment to future generations will have a tendency to weaken and destroy public energy.

I cannot but deplore the attitude of the national banks and their friends in relation to the speedy payment of the bonds. While it will be conceded that the payment of these bonds and the utter wiping out of our national debt is a thing most devoutly to be sought after, every interest of the banks, financial as well as political, is against the project. Composed, as are these banks, of the foremost business men of almost every community, and in many instances of men who generously furnished the money with which the war was carried on to a successful termination, it is indeed to be deplored that this large body of influential business men should be at cross-purposes with the best interests of the Government. But it perhaps would be unnatural to be unselfish.

In almost every considerable town and village in the land is a national bank. Thus, scattered all over the broad land, east, west, north, south, you have a network of business interests, closely combined, to which direction is given from a common center, the financial center of the country. The confidential and suggestive circular sent out from this center produces an impression all along the line. Irresistible and overpowering in relation to the financial affairs of the nation, this influence steps boldly into the arena of politics and dictates who shall be the candidates and which of the candidates shall be successful. Such a combination of power has never heretofore existed in the country, crossing political lines, governed alone by self-interest, acquiring strength alone from the special privileges of the Government.

It is idle to say they enjoy no special privileges. And it is but natural that they should be loath to part with this preference. In a business sense they have a right to cling to them as long as the people will bear with the imposition. Even in holy writ they find some excuse for its retention. "He that hath, to him shall be given; but he that hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath." Or, in other words, he that hath $100,000 with which to buy bonds shall immediately have added thereto $90,000 in bank notes, in order that he may have $190,000; but he that hath nothing, except a large family and hands to work with, shall have taken away even that which he hath, in order that the interest on the bonds may be paid. Gentlemen say that the banking privileges are free to all; that any company of men who have the money may engage in it; that they are not accountable for the poverty of the people. They forget that not every man can become rich; that in fact only a few out of the many can acquire wealth; that the misfortunes of life as well as the mistakes and surroundings of men preclude them. But see how unequal you thus make the struggle of life. To the already fortunate you add greater favor, but to the poor you preclude the possibility of success.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it is either wise or prudent to proceed with undue haste in the matter of funding the maturing debt. While it may be true, as the Secretary of the Treasury insists, if the debt is now to be funded, that some preparation should be made before the 1st of February, in order that ninety days' notice may be given before the 1st of May, yet the preliminary question as to whether it is necessary to fund at all ought first to be definitely settled.

The extraordinary change that has taken place in the country and in this House within the last few months convinces me that no fixed conclusions have been reached. It was contended at last session that forty-year bonds should be issued, that the amount to be funded exceeded seven hundred millions of dollars, and that the interest rate should not be less than 3½ per cent. It is now conceded that the Treasurer can pay in the immediate future all of this debt in excess of six hundred millions, that the rate of interest need not exceed 3 per cent., and that in no event ought the time to extend beyond the period of ten years. This marvelous change convinces me that the equilibrium of public sentiment has not been reached and that hasty action would be unwise.

It ought not to be forgotten that no part of the maturing debt can press upon the Government for payment, but that its payment is entirely at the option of the Government itself.

That it would be safer to retain the option to pay whenever it can, and cheaper to have its payments credited on the part of the Government as they are made, and interest at once stopped, can scarcely admit of a doubt. The vast sum of almost four millions of dollars has already been paid by the Government to the speculators in bonds, because the option to pay had been bartered away. The payment of these premiums for bonds in the market is an absolute squandering of the public funds, from which no one derives any benefit excepting the bond speculator, and such management of the public affairs deserves the condemnation of every citizen. There can be no excuse offered for depriving the Government of the right to pay whenever it has the funds to do so.

But gentlemen have arrogated to themselves all the virtue and all the honesty of the country because they propose to reduce the interest on the public debt. It has been demonstrated that the present maturing debt can be paid within the next ten years, unless our country is overtaken by some unforeseen calamity. And yet these virtuous gentlemen propose to preclude the Government from the possibility of payment during this time unless we go into the open market and pay the bond speculator his price for the bonds.

That the amount of interest to be paid will be less than any proposed by gentlemen in case of continued payments directly applied from month to month and from year to year, thus stopping interest on these amounts, is a matter of the simplest mathematical demonstration. The honorable gentleman, Judge KELLEY, has so forcibly put this idea that I quote him:

> The interest on the sixes would be $26,400,000, and that on the fives while the annual payments were going on would be $76,072,000 and for the period required to pay the six percents would, as I have said, be $83,825,000, giving a total of interest during the whole process of payment of $186,298,062.
> By this process we would have paid every bondholder that was entitled to 6 per cent. his full interest, and every one entitled to 5 per cent. his full interest; yet we would have paid interest on the whole debt for but one-half of the period, for we would have been paying it regularly along and extinguishing the debt in ten years, so that the total interest paid would be precisely five years' full interest. It would be an interest rate during the period of gradual payment of from 2.60 to 2.65 per cent. Two hundred million dollars carry 6 per cent. and $437,000,000 carry 5 per cent. He who will add the total of interest on these two sums for ten years and divide it by two will ascertain the annual rate of interest we will have paid, and find that it will have been lower than that proposed by any bill.
> No bill proposes to pay less than 3 per cent. Therefore they all propose to pay for the privilege of surrendering the option we are soon to possess. They propose to pay for the privilege of extending a debt which we may pay year by year out of our current surplus at a lower rate of annual interest than is proposed in any bill, and to extend it by the scheme of the Secretary of the Treasury for fifteen years, with a possibility of forty years, and by that of the Committee of Ways and Means for twenty years, with a possibility of forty years.
> In the name of the nation that stands as an exemplar to the oppressed people of the world I appeal to gentlemen to do no wanton act which shall lead them to believe that the American people regard a national debt as a national blessing and are willing to pay for the privilege of perpetuating it.

If it be said that payments will be made month after month in case this funding bill is passed, as they are now made and as the surplus funds will permit, the answer is that the same force that seeks to fund into long-time bonds is just as actively at work in seeking the reduction of taxation, by which, if successful, they will deprive the Government of the power to pay at all. These gentlemen ask that the tax may be taken off bank circulation, bank deposits, bank-checks, and other items from which revenue is derived. So that this business is the determination of a policy to be pursued rather than the simple consideration of this bill. The question is, shall the debt be paid at all or shall it become perpetual?

No private business concern of any prudence whatever would continue to have its paper discounted, with the accompanying expense of interest, if it had the means to pay. I do not believe that any different rule can be applied to the affairs of the Government. But this proposition brings us in conflict with a school of financial philosophers, which has grown up in this country in imitation of those in Great Britain and other monarchical governments, who claim that "a public debt is a public blessing." You hear many discreet persons, with apparent candor, declare that it is absolutely necessary to have a public debt in order that the vast amount of trust money and other surplus funds in the country may be absorbed; that the nation must be encumbered that the people may prosper; that the highest state of prosperity means a want of money on the part of the Government to pay its just obligations.

The doctrine itself would be entirely unaccountable in logic, as it is foreign to every principle of republican institutions, were it not for the fact that the existence of a public debt adds largely to the money-making power of a small class of our people. By considering for a moment the results of the absolute extinguishment and payment of our public debt, will help us to appreciate the change that must take place. Fifty thousand office-holders would be left without occupation, and the Government pay-roll correspondingly reduced. The burdens and responsibilities in governing the nation would be greatly removed, and customs of primitive simplicity could be restored. With the bonds paid, our cumbersome and expensive national-banking system would be wiped out, its special privileges gone, and the Bureau of Printing and Engraving reduced to a shadow.

I believe it to be the controlling financial idea, in the background of both of the old political parties, that this debt shall remain unpaid. Unrepublican and undemocratic as it is in every essential feature, it cannot be openly expressed in the face of the people; but covertly and with a hidden design, every step of a large class of our financial managers is on a line parallel with that idea. One of the strongest evidences of the truth of this proposition is the evident desire of the prominent leaders of the combined parties to fund nearly eight hundred millions of our public debt for twenty or even forty years, if it were found possible to do so. No nation that has funded her debt into long bonds, or deferred its payments for a long term of years, has ever paid that debt. History affords no instance of the payment of a national debt that has assumed a permanent character and passed beyond the generation in which it was contracted. Great Britain less than two hundred years ago initiated her system of deferred payments with an insignificant sum of less than six millions of dollars—which under the profound wisdom of her financial teachers has grown to the enormous sum of more than four billions of dollars. France, Italy, and Russia are like witnesses of the truth of the assertion that deferred payments are the precursors of a permanent debt. It can then be fairly assumed that the men who are in favor of issuing long-time bonds also favor making our national debt a perpetual one.

In making the proposition I am about to offer I am aware that I shall meet the opposition of the most powerful combination of financial influences that exist in the country; to be resisted by combined force, because it strikes at their selfish interests. The national banking system is a creature that lives and prospers on account of the special favors it enjoys. It would be almost unparalleled for those who enjoy special privileges of so important a character to give them up without a struggle. Yet there are instances where men, and even nations, have risen above every sordid motive. These perhaps are exceptions. My proposition is simply to retire the national-bank notes and substitute full legal-tender notes in their stead.

This would give the United States Treasurer $350,000,000 with which to pay off and cancel a like amount of the public debt without disturbing the amount of paper money in circulation and without interfering with any one except the national banks, and without affecting them except as to their special privileges. They could thus get rid of tax on circulation and the country would have a better paper money than at present. The balance of two hundred and fifty millions could well remain to be paid out of current revenue without funding at all. In three years the whole of the present maturing debt could readily be paid, with seven years left to prepare for the next bonds that fall due. This proposition places us face to face with the other question, as to whether the Government has the right and the power to issue paper money. It has the right under the express terms of the Constitution "to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin."

At the time that this provision was drawn the use of paper money was almost entirely unknown, and there can be no reasonable doubt but that the framers of the Constitution intended to clothe the General Government with all the authority necessary to control the entire issuing of all money. But coupled with this and as high as the Constitution itself is the right in the Government to protect its own existence and secure the happiness and prosperity of the people. As well might the strict constructionist say that the right "to establish post-offices and post-roads" limited the carrying of the mails to the lumbering old stage-coaches of a century ago, and that there was no authority for carrying them on the railroads, at that time unknown.

How do these hard-money advocates treat the argument themselves? They do not hesitate for a moment to transfer the right to issue paper money to the national banks. In fact, all parties admit that there is not a sufficient quantity of the precious metals to make up our currency. Where does the right come from that they so freely accord to the banks? If the right does not exist, how does it come that they undertake to delegate it by statute? The fact is there is no intelligent body of men in the country who doubt the authority of the Government to issue paper money; but the doubt arises as to the propriety of allowing this right to the people through their representatives in Congress. A select few, the rich and the powerful—the bankers—are alone to be intrusted with this authority, an aristocratic idea conceived in sin and born of iniquity. The Government actually does, day after day under existing law, issue paper money, and it has the sanction of the highest authority in the land, the Supreme Court of the United States, for so doing.

The national-bank party, driven to the necessity, are constantly charging upon its opponents the intention to re-establish State banks of issue, and then in glowing terms portray the evils of that system. This is a trick that is as unreasonable as it is dishonest. There is no one that proposes any such plan. The power to issue money is vested in the General Government. I do not believe it even has the power to delegate that authority. It is a right that can alone be exercised by the supreme power of the nation; and it is idle to charge upon us any attempt to revive the evils and absurdities of the old State banking system.

There is a "twin relic" standing alongside of our present banking system that I cannot help but notice in this connection; and that is the single standard theory—that gold alone shall be money. Everything shall be bought with gold; everything shall be sold for gold; a most disinterested and unselfish proposition, since all the gold in the land is owned or controlled by its advocates. How monstrous this proposition is will appear when you consider that there is not enough gold in the United States to pay the assessed poor tax of the land. And yet these financial fanatics, in case of calamity, would reduce us to the terrible necessity of redeeming everything in gold. A new system of idolatry is to be established, and gold is to be the god. This gold, that has proved itself to be both a coward and a traitor, is to be made supreme ruler. At the approach of trouble in the country it hides away like a dastardly villain, and when the shock of battle comes is more than apt to go over to the enemy. The severest test of financial respectability hinges on this point—as to whether you are a pure and simple goldite. But all of these propositions resolve themselves into the more elementary one of whether you are for the great, the rich, and the powerful, or for the poor, the weak, and the oppressed. Republicanism in its primitive days derived its inspiration and its soul from its defense of the poor and the helpless. It was considered to be a noble thing to bear the stings of reproach for its defense of the down-trodden. I believe there is enough virtue and patriotism left in the American people to vindicate the rights of the wronged.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. J. W. DWIGHT,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. DWIGHT said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: No one who desires to preserve and improve the credit of the Government can doubt the wisdom of refunding so much of the public debt as we are unable to pay at a lower rate of interest than it now bears. If on the $638,000,000 of the debt which will become redeemable between the first days of May and July next 2 per cent. per annum can be saved in interest $12,760,000 can be applied in payment of the principal of the debt without increasing the burdens of taxation.

The duty of Congress is plain. It should promptly pass a refunding bill that will enable the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow money to pay all the bonds as fast as they become redeemable, provided he can save money to the people by so doing.

That differences of opinion exist as to the rate of interest which should be fixed is not surprising. With the ever-changing phases of the money market, no one can now foretell with mathematical exactness whether it can be done at 3 per cent., 3½ per cent., or even 4 per cent. I would therefore provide in the bill now under discussion that the Secretary of the Treasury may issue and put upon the market the necessary amount of bonds, bearing interest at as high a rate as 3½ per cent. It is, in my judgment, wiser to vest in that officer such discretion than for us to fix it arbitrarily here. I do not myself believe that our debt can now be refunded at 3 per cent., certainly not unless the bonds are permitted to run for a long period of time, which is not likely to be consented to by this Congress. It would be a grave blunder to so legislate here as to make the attempt to refund the debt at a lower rate of interest a failure.

The great and varied industries and enterprises of the country are all active, which require for constant use vast sums of money, and for which from 5 per cent. to 8 per cent. per annum is readily paid.

The reasons why it seems improbable that the debt can be refunded at 3 per cent. are obvious and numerous, and might be elaborated if time permitted. That does not, however, seem to be necessary, for as I fear it has already been predetermined by the majority party here that no successful refunding bill shall be permitted to pass during this session, and, if I am right in this apprehension, reasons would not avail in changing the purposes of the majority.

I trust that I may be permitted to call the attention of Congress and the country to some of the reasons that have led me to conclude that the other side intend to prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from refunding.

In the course of this discussion the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] said:

I assert this proposition, that to pay the debt in standard silver dollars will cost the people less than to pay it in any manner of refunding. At the present price of silver bullion, $48,000,000 of revenues will purchase sufficient bullion to coin fifty-four millions of standard silver dollars; so that $54,000,000 is the maximum required by law to be coined. We see that there is a clear profit of $6,000,000 on every forty-eight millions' worth of bullion; so that we save to the people $6,000,000 on every fifty-four millions of debt thus paid. If, then, we pay at the rate of fifty-four millions annually, we reduce the debt to that extent, and thus reduce the interest. By this process we can pay the debt of five hundred and eighty-two millions in about ten years. During that time we will have paid about eighteen millions of interest and five hundred and eighty-two millions of principal, making, in all, $600,000,000. The profit in coinage will have been $72,000,000. Subtract $72,000,000 from $600,000,000, and we have as a result $528,000,000. It will thus be seen that we have paid the whole debt of $582,000,000 and the interest on it for ten years at 5 per cent. with $528,000,000, thus not only saving all the interest, but $54,000,000 of the principal. In short, $528,000,000 expended in the purchase of silver bullion will, under the silver law, pay off this debt and the interest on it during the process of payment. This is what the people expect and demand of us. This was the object and intent of the silver law.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] said among other things:

The people of the United States have been swindled enough in the refunding of our debt, and I hope no more such frauds will be practiced upon them. We lost millions by refunding the bonds payable in greenbacks into bonds payable in coin, and we will lose millions more if we refund bonds payable in silver into bonds payable in gold.

A distinguished writer has said, "Abraham Lincoln described the Government of the United States as one of the people, by the people, and for the people," but his successors have perverted it into one "of the bondholder, by the bondholder, and for the bondholder." During our late canvass for President the public were amused and deluded by the payment of the debt at the rate of from six to eleven millions per month, and by their votes they indorsed this rapid cancellation of their bonds. Now that the election is over, and the offices secured for another four years, the payment ceases and we are asked to refund at long time.

But, sir, there is another and most serious objection to refunding this debt. The democratic party has been denouncing the republicans for creating a bomb-proof sanctuary for the investments of capitalists, where they would pay no taxes, and now a democratic Congress is talking about doing the same thing. When money is growing scarce in trade and when all classes of industries are laboring under heavy loads of taxation a democratic Congress is talking about again bringing the Government into the market as a borrower to compete with its citizens, and, worse still, are talking about creating six hundred and seventy millions of property that shall pay no taxes.

Sir, there are a thousand industries in every part of this broad land only awaiting the quickening influence of capital to spring up, and yet a democratic House is talking about offering inducements to bankers to hide their money in Government bonds. I have seen the demoralization of defeat on many fields. I have seen cannoniers cutting loose their horses; I have seen infantry in flight throwing away their arms, and I have seen hatless horsemen in wild retreat; but, sir, if a democratic House shall change bonds payable in silver into bonds payable in gold, and shall create six hundred and seventy millions of wealth to bear no share in the burden of taxation, I shall confess that I have never seen demoralization before. I am opposed, sir, to any refunding whatever. I shall vote to amend the bill as far as I can, and then I shall vote against it when amended.

Now, Mr. Chairman, whatever the purposes of gentlemen who use such language may be, for myself I must conclude that it tends to impair the public credit and embarrasses refunding. I admit that when the first bonds were issued to raise the money to put down a causeless and wicked rebellion the silver dollar containing 412½ grains, and the gold dollar containing 25.8 grains, were recognized by all parties as the legal currency of the country. It must be remembered, however, that the Congress of the United States in 1873 attempted to adopt one standard by stopping the coinage of silver dollars, and gold was therefore regarded as the standard currency of the country, and this was done when 412½ grains of silver were worth in the markets of the world more than 25.8 grains of gold.

As we saw fit to practically adopt the gold standard, and at a time when it was the cheaper metal, it is, in my judgment, against good morals and against the public credit to readopt the double standard after having sold our bonds for gold, and after silver has fallen in value to eighty-six or eighty-seven cents on the dollar in the markets of the world, unless we put silver enough into each dollar to make it as valuable as gold.

General CHALMERS must, I think, have forgotten the statute of 1862, which authorized the issuing of bonds to obtain money to enable the Union armies to cause "the demoralization of defeat on many fields," of which he so eloquently spoke, provided that the customs revenues of the Government should be collected in coin to pay the interest on the bonds, and 1 per cent. per annum, collected in like manner, as a sinking fund, and set it apart for the redemption of the principal of the bonds. That statute clearly made both principal and interest of every bond that has been issued payable in coin. The gentleman's charge that "the people of the United States have been swindled in refunding the bonds payable in greenbacks into bonds payable in coin," should not have been made, because the bonds have all been sold for the equivalent of coin, and by their terms and by the provisions of the statute they were all payable in coin.

I am glad to see that the gentleman has commenced to quote the martyred Lincoln. I trust he will bye and bye really admire the character and official conduct of that great and good man, and when he does he will realize that Lincoln respected the rights of all men, and never hated a bondholder who loaned his honest earnings to the Government to enable it to perpetuate its existence. And, moreover, that he believed that the creditors of the Government should all be paid and the public credit fully maintained, so that its integrity should nowhere be doubted.

The gentleman says the democratic party has been denouncing the republicans for creating a bomb-proof sanctuary for the investment of capitalists, where they would pay no taxes. It certainly seems strange that he should so misunderstand or so misquote history, for undisputed facts will declare, both now and forever, that the gentleman and his democratic allies created the necessity for issuing the bonds, and that they so far impaired the credit of the Government as to make it necessary for it to accept less than forty cents on the dollar for its promises to pay, and that it was therefore obliged to exempt its bonds from taxation to secure purchasers.

Perhaps it should not create any surprise that all men who would have destroyed the Union cannot consent to forgive those who invested their honest accumulations in Government bonds. Union soldiers, fed, clothed, equipped, transported, and cared for by the means derived from the sales of the bonds, defeated those who were determined to destroy the grandest and the best government on earth. We may therefore expect to hear much said in criticism of the hateful bondholder until all of our countrymen learn to love the Union.

My distinguished colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Hon. FERNANDO WOOD,] among other statements said:

A profit of hundreds of millions of dollars has fallen into the hands of a few men in consequence of the shameful policy of this Government in humbly beseeching the syndicates and the banks, the capitalists of Europe and New York, to be so kind as to take our 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds. [Applause.] The time has now arrived when "Uncle Sam" is "stalwart," in the language of my friend. This nation stands to-day upon her imperial power. Her resources in the earth and above the earth, in the manly industry and energy of her people, are as ten to one compared with those of any other nation in the world. I for one, in the expiring hours of a public life of forty years, will never consent that this great country shall hawk its credit through the money markets of the world. [Applause.]

I will venture, Mr. Chairman, to say that in my opinion the gentleman has no justification whatever in making the charges above quoted. These charges are in harmony, however, with the gentleman's political prejudices and conduct at the breaking out of the rebellion and since, which in my judgment have cost the Government in blood and treasure a thousand times more than any mistakes that have been made by the friends of the Government in placing its numerous loans.

Since gentlemen have seen fit to make the observations which I have quoted, I assume that they will not take exception if I call attention to the fact, as I now do, that the democratic party has a record showing its ability, or rather its want of ability, in dealing with financial questions. When it was last in full control of every department of the Government, and when the whole amount of the public debt was less than the annual interest is now upon our bonded indebtedness, it was unable to borrow money upon the credit of the Government at a less rate than from 10 per cent. to 12 per cent. per annum.

Since that period this same party has shown great facility in creating indebtedness; but if it has shown any facility in paying the debt, I am not aware of it.

Now, sir, suppose you determine by law that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have no discretion as to the rate of interest that he may pay, and he should find that he cannot refund the debt at 3 per cent. The result will necessarily be that you defer the consummation of the efforts for at least a year, which will cost more than twelve million dollars, besides impairing the public credit. On the other hand, if you give the Secretary the discretion, that will enable him to pay 3½ per cent. and thereby both obtain the needed money, save a very large sum in the reduction of interest, and improve the public credit. But I am admonished that the time allotted to me has already expired, and I crave the indulgence of the House for a moment longer to call especial attention to the quotations I have made from the speeches of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS.] The first-named gentleman, as will be observed, wants to pay the public debt, if it is paid at all, at eighty-six or eighty-seven cents on the dollar, and as much less as silver bullion may be purchased for.

The gentleman from Mississippi regards it as a most disastrous calamity, as will be seen by his reasoning, to refund the public debt at a lower rate of interest than it now bears.

Mr. Chairman, I must conclude that the majority of the people of this country will be as unwilling to follow these gentlemen now on the great questions of finance as they were to march under their banners during the war.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. G. G. BENNETT,

OF DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. BENNETT said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The discussion on this bill has taken a wide range, and has given ample opportunity for the presentation of the multifarious theories entertained on the question of national financiering. The measure is one providing for the refunding of the national debt; but, if judged by some of the amendments and substitutes offered, it must be regarded by several members on this floor as one to defeat that purpose, a purpose and object which in their estimation must be reprehensible and exceedingly pernicious.

The great mistake which lies at the bottom of many theories or vagaries entertained by professed public teachers on this branch of political economy consists in a willful or ignorant forgetfulness of the fact that in business transactions and relations the Government is only a person; an artificial one, it is true, but nevertheless a person; and that in its financial transactions and dealings with its own citizens and the outside world it must recognize the well-established laws of business or it will sooner or later find itself on the road to bankruptcy.

A nation does not possess in the remotest degree that supreme creative power that can call into existence something out of nothing, or give to that the solid substance of fact which is but a hollow lie. Money is defined, laconically, to be current coin, and in a certain sense is the creature of law, receiving its character as a circulating medium through the stamp of legislative sanction. But it by no means follows that in the wise and prudent administration of government anything and to any amount may be declared money, regardless of its intrinsic value or the power or possibility of redemption in something which, in the ordinary transactions of life, may be regarded as a good and valuable consideration. A government that compels its citizens to accept a currency of its own issue, without intrinsic value, non-convertible, and irredeemable, makes simply a forced loan, without interest, something resorted to only by despotic governments or governments in great financial straits, or in times of great emergency and peril.

But we are asked what about the greenback? Why is it to-day on a par with gold? In the first place, the greenback had its birth in the struggles of this nation for existence. It was the child of a dire and terrible necessity, and so long as the life of this Republic hung trembling in the balance it was of a very uncertain and depreciated value. The greenback lived, not because the people had faith in it, but in the Government that stood behind it. Faith that it would survive the desperate struggle and hold its place as a nation among the nations? Yes; but more. They believed it would redeem its promises, and, like an honest debtor, pay its obligations to the last farthing. And just as fast as the country recovered from the calamities of war and commenced climbing the heights of prosperity the greenback kept pace with it, and when the Government announced its ability and readiness to pay all of its outstanding matured obligations in gold and silver the greenback sprang to par. Will any one pretend to say such would have been the case had they been irredeemable or non-convertible?

But if greenbacks constitute so good and so safe a currency, why not issue a sufficient volume, with the surplus money in the Treasury, to pay off the maturing bonds, and thus dispense with refunding? That legislator is very unwise who never forecasts the future nor provides against a possible disaster or emergency. There are, without pretending to give the exact figures, about three hundred and fifty millions of greenbacks in circulation. Add to that the amount necessary to redeem the bonds now maturing, and which are sought to be refunded by this bill, after using all the surplus in the Treasury, and we find on our hands the appalling sum of $1,000,000,000, for the redemption of which we are liable every day and every hour.

But it may be said the people are so well satisfied with them they will not be presented for redemption. That may be so long as this era of prosperity continues, and so long as the balance of foreign trade is so largely in our favor and gold continues to pour in on us in a steady stream. But let another financial crisis such as struck and staggered us in 1873 again overtake us; let the wheels in our mills stop, the fires in our forges die out, and our factories close their doors; let the balance of trade turn against us and gold and silver take up their steady march from our shores, (and such times will periodically come,) then you will find men clamoring at the doors of our Treasury only to see them closed, and this great nation suspending specie payment, thereby adding to the general calamity and financial demoralization. I am aware that in the theory that embraces such a system of finance redemption is not a factor. But I do not forget that this Government has resumed specie payment, has given its solemn promise to the world, and in the faithful keeping of that promise are involved its honor, its stability, and its perpetuity. Not only is the Government as such concerned, but the highest welfare and prosperity of the people, for we are all bound up in the bundle together.

The national-bank notes, forming a portion of the circulating currency of the country, redeemable in greenbacks or coin by the banks, relieves the Government to the extent of that circulation from the obligation of redemption, and makes the success of the policy of resumption not only possible, but its failure impossible; for the time is past when any one seriously doubts the ability of this Government, under its present financial policy, to meet all the demands that are likely to be made on the Treasury by the holders of its securities. Then the question is asked, Why not abolish national banks and substitute Treasury notes for their circulation? Several good and sufficient reasons might be given. The Government should, like a prudent business person, never allow its obligations payable on demand to exceed its possible available resources provided for that purpose, except in times of great emergency. It will not do for the Government to act on the theory that these notes would never be presented for payment any more than it would for a banker to presume that the notes which he issues will never again come to his counter for redemption; but, strange to say, there are men who seemingly have no conception of national honor, who regard the Government as a thing of power, with the right to do or not to do what it pleases, in utter disregard of all principles of moral honesty or political economy, and with no accountability to either God or man.

In all civilized nations, banks and bankers are regarded necessary for the proper and convenient transaction of commercial affairs. They existed in the country before national banks, and they would continue to exist if that system was abolished. We have a national debt, and in all human probability will continue to have one for years to come. Why not utilize that debt for banking purposes? True, we may retire the national-bank circulation and substitute Treasury notes, and with these notes pay off the bonds hypothecated for the security of the holder of the national-bank currency, and to that extent reduce our interest. This can be done if we are prepared to compel the creditors of the Government to take non-interest-bearing securities in place of interest-bearing, and throw upon the Treasury the burden of this additional volume of currency, liable to be called upon to redeem it at any time.

National banks are treated on this floor by certain gentlemen as though they were inimical to our institutions, dangerous monopolies to be placed under the most rigorous restraints, and finally pressed to the wall.

It is urged that it is unsafe to commit to these corporations so large a control in determining the volume of our currency, and therefore that control should be lodged absolutely in Congress. One of the greatest mistakes of the age consists in supposing that all honesty and wisdom are monopolized by legislators, and that the panacea for all social and financial evils is to be found in legislative enactments. The laws of trade and commerce are pliable and elastic, accommodating themselves to the varied changes and vicissitudes known in the realm of business, and cannot be brought within the rigid lines of statutory phraseology. The volume of currency must, as far as possible, and within the proper limits of safety and soundness, be left to be adjusted by the same principles. In other words, it must be elastic, so as to meet the ever-changing conditions and demands of business.

This desired result can only be attained under some such system as we now have, one that is not in any sense a monopoly, but open and free to all who may have the desire and the means to embark in the banking business. Capital will seek this channel for investment, and men will engage in it just so long as there may be such a demand for money as to make it profitable. When it no longer pays dividends, they will wind up their concerns, retire their circulation, and find other and more lucrative employment for their means. This system gives a volume of currency that can be varied with demand, and not to be fixed by any procustean rule or cast-iron method. It brings it nearer to the people, distributes capital, interests men in every part of our country in maintaining the public credit, and in making resumption on the part of the General Government an unquestioned and unquestionable consummation. If national banks should be abolished and the entire currency of the country consist in Treasury notes, it is conceded by all that some limitation would have to be placed on the volume to be issued. That duty would devolve on Congress, and would of necessity be exercised arbitrarily. Under the present system, with the present limit on the issue of greenbacks, inflation is scarcely possible beyond a healthy condition.

It matters not what the issue of a bank may be, or how well secured its notes are, it will lie in the vaults of that bank unless the interests of business and the demands of trade and commerce require its circulation; and, as before stated, if there is no demand for it it will be retired. Not so under the cast-iron system that would prevail were the nation the banker. The volume authorized would be issued and floated regardless of its effect on values and the business of the country. The bulls and bears of Wall street and the gamblers of the gold-rooms would be transferred to the corridors of this Capitol; and if Congress assumes to exercise legislative control over the business of railways in manner contemplated by the bill now pending, there will be inaugurated such a system of jobbery and corruption as has never found a parallel in history. One Congress might fix the volume at seven hundred millions, the next might deem it wise to increase it to twelve hundred millions, while the next might reduce it to five hundred millions. With such fluctuation, such uncertainty, such instability, where would the business interests of the country land? It needs but the bare statement of the proposition to show its absurd and dangerous character.

Why, then, meddle with a system that is so satisfactory in its workings? Above all things the people want a paper dollar that is worth a dollar in gold, and that in times of financial reverses and panics will not turn to dust and ashes in their pockets. That we have now. Good, whether in Maine or on the Gulf, from Hell Gate to Golden Gate. Everything else may disappoint us, but our money never; for behind the greenback and the national-bank note stands the plighted faith of this great Government for their redemption, and until this Government fails our currency is secure.

There is much cheap talk about the "people" being ground down and oppressed by capital, and especially "bank monopolies." If we had a few facts and fewer figures of speech, it would be more satisfactory. Judging by these rhetorical flourishes, we might conclude that by "people" is meant the paupers of the land, men who never handle a dollar, draw a check, or purchase a bill of exchange. In this day and age of the world it is no virtue to be poor when so many avenues to wealth are open to the industrious and sagacious. Nor have I yet learned that it is a crime to be rich.

It was not the man who returned to his master the talent which he had hid in the earth who was commended, but he who brought "five other talents," the accumulation from the honest use and employment of the original capital.

It is capital that builds our railways, constructs our telegraphs, develops our mines, operates our factories, kindles the fires in our furnaces and forges, whitens the seas with our commerce, furnishes to the honest laborer remunerative employment, and drives the life-blood of prosperity and progress through every vein and artery of our social and commercial system. But it has become fashionable to inveigh against capital. It might be expected from communistic, sand-lot politicians, but not from men who aspire to the place and dignity of law-makers and statesmen.

Nowhere does the dignity of labor receive such recognition as in this country; and the glory of our institutions consists in the fact that men are estimated according to their worth as men, and not by their bank account. The man who is rich to-day may be poor to-morrow, and the man who is poor to-day may be rich to-morrow. What extreme folly and how wicked the attempt to array one interest against another, when the men who represent them may change places in a few hours. Neither class can well succeed without the other, their interests are in common; and laws which protect men in their rights, but leave them as far as possible free to fight their own battles and carve out their own fortunes, are the wisest and most salutary.

I have said thus much on our present financial system, because I deem it a safe and wise one, and because it has recently received such an amount of unmerited and unjustifiable abuse. I am in favor of paying off the national debt as rapidly as possible without making taxation burdensome, and certainly would not favor the continuance of that bonded indebtedness for the simple purpose of providing a basis for the existence of national banks. When the debt is paid, and we no longer have bonds with which to secure a bank circulation, I apprehend the wisdom of the country will be equal to the task of providing some other method equally safe and satisfactory.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. GEORGE W. JONES,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, January 8, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. JONES said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Having already made my argument and entered my protest against the refunding policy proposed by the bill, I had not thought to participate further in the debate until the late elections, with the parties and their issues involved, were thrust into it. Of the three parties, the greenback alone ever desired or now designs the extinguishment of the national debt. The ability is ample and the situation most opportune to pay maturing obligations. The demand for full legal-tender United States notes exceeds greatly the bonds. These notes are preferable to coin because more convenient, and as a common medium of exchange they would take the place of so much gold, and their serviceableness as such medium would maintain them at par with metallic money.

It is said that creditors will not take legal-tender paper in payment of coin bonds. Have we tried them? During the year 1879 there was paid into the Treasury, in exchange for absolute paper money, forty millions more in coin than there was tendered of legal-tender paper for redemption in coin. At the United States Treasury to-day you cannot get legal-tender currency in change for a twenty-dollar gold piece. Creditors never refuse the better currency, but if in this instance they should, just to fulfill the prophecy of politicians, the Treasurer could easily exchange the paper for coin and thus practically obviate the difficulty. Yet there are those who tell us that republican legislation has made the bonds all payable in coin, and therefore we cannot now pay them and must needs refund. The pretense is transparent. It is assumed by nincompoops, who suppose the people such dolts that they cannot discern Mammon through the gauze.

It never has been and never can be a matter of practical consequence whether the debt be payable in coin or paper, if the one be as good as the other. There could be no gain to the debtor or loss to the creditor; so nothing to wrangle about. "Where there is a will there is a way."

The whole subject resolves itself practically into the simple question, Does the law make money?

The fiat theory asserts that the law makes money; that money is not wealth, but in its simple character merely the means of exchanging wealth, credit being its chief element and dependent upon the authority making it. So that a small State, or one of doubtful credit, can make but little or none; while a great State, of solid foundations and large resources, can make money proportionally.

By money is meant whatever the State receives and makes a legal tender in all payments. The metallic theory asserts that nothing can be money but gold and silver, and that all other currency depends for its value upon a metallic basis.

The issue is fairly presented by the bill under consideration. The friends of the metals will vote for Treasury notes without the legal tender, and for refunding in some form; while those who have faith in the Government and believe in its ability to make money will vote against refunding in any form.

This issue was prominently involved in the late elections; democrats and republicans supporting the metallic, and the greenbackers the fiat theory. If the vote cast could be taken as an expression of popular opinion on this particular issue, then further advocation of the people's cause would be futile, and wisdom would counsel and valor allow the greenbackers to decline further combat and acquiesce in the triumph and unavoidable sway of a metallic oligarchy. But partyism was the controlling element in the elections, and as there was no issue of public policy between democrats and republicans the result merely exhibits the positive and relative power of democratic and republican clannishness over the American people. The clansman true rallied to the flag and caught and echoed the watchword, little considering anything else than the success of his clan and the defeat of its inveterate foe; and thus it has been in successive elections for the last twenty-five years, and time and disaster seem to increase and consolidate this blind power. No matter how wielded or to what ends devoted, absolute, blind obedience and uncomplaining devotion have characterized its dupes, tools, and victims.

Example: In 1878 the democratic party of Texas adopted a fiat platform, denouncing banks and demanding that the Government alone should issue paper currency, and when issued should be made of full legal tender and in quantities to meet the demand of the population for money. In 1880 the same democratic party, with the same leaders and same following, ratified the Cincinnati hard-money national-bank platform and ticket, and gave them their support without the slightest change in cheek or least abatement of zeal, such being the talismanic sway and potent influence of clannishness. The alternative is plain; this power must be overthrown or it will overthrow the Republic.

In popular government party is natural and necessary; natural because men will differ, especially upon political topics, and necessary as suitable instrumentality to formulate different opinions into practical issues, and thus serve to ascertain and give force and effect to popular opinion in the administration of the government.

But the great danger to popular institutions is the clannishness—clanism—which party association and strife always endanger, which, surviving the issues, stimulates pride to folly and prejudice to madness; and transferred to new issues fealty to clan absorbs all patriotic aspirations and devotes the partisan to the Juggernaut of faction. If parties should pass away with the issues that excite them, our Republic would be exempt from danger; and why not? In our constitutional government, wherein its jurisdiction and all the fundamental principles of social and political rights are plainly defined and acknowledged by organic law, parties can differ only as to questions of expediency. These in the nature of things are not continuous, but successive, and being always different in some phase, circumstance, or interest involved, partisans formerly agreeing would naturally differ as to new measures, and hence the transfer of partisan fealty from the old to the new would obstruct and coerce instead of facilitating the expression of public opinion.

Before the adoption of the Constitution fundamental differences existed, but they were settled by its adoption, and now such differences become issuable only when presented in the form of Constitutional amendments. It is true we have two schools, one babbling Nation and the other State rights, but brought to any practical test they appeal to the same Constitution, invoke and apply the same canons of interpretation, cite the same precedents, and recognize the same authoritative expositions. The disciples of Nation recognize constitutional boundaries and acknowledge the reserved rights of the States, while those of the State-rights school acknowledge the paramount authority of the General Government within the boundaries fixed by the Constitution. Both profess unbounded loyalty, and morning and evening renew the vow and pledge life, fortune, and sacred honor to uphold, protect, and defend the Constitution and to perpetuate the union of the States thereunder. Analyzed, the difference is in statement, not in substance, "words ranked in right learned phrase" to the contrary notwithstanding.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. J. S. RICHARDSON,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I shall vote for the bill under consideration, because I believe it necessary to pass some refunding bill. I do not, however, approve all the provisions of this bill. I believe that the Government should have the option to pay the bonds after three years, and for the good and to my mind sufficient reason that before the expiration of five years, at which time, according to the provision of this bill, the option of the Government to pay begins to run, we shall likely have $200,000,000 of revenue in the Treasury without the right to pay it out on any debt of the Government. In my judgment it is unwise to lose the interest on this enormous sum of money, which we could save by providing to pay it out on the bonds proposed by this bill to be issued. It is equally unwise to my mind to lock up that amount of money in the Treasury and thus withhold it from the business of the country.

I believe, too, that the bonds should have a longer time to run than ten years. I doubt the ability of the Government to sell the bonds at par on so short time. Twenty years would insure their sale at par, and the Government, with the option to pay within its own grasp, can suffer nothing from the length of time suggested.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. J. C. BURROWS,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. BURROWS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: And here is the conclusion of the whole matter: A simple business proposition to provide for the funding of a portion of the national debt at a lower rate of interest, requiring for its consideration only the calm judgment of sound business men, and which ought to have been disposed of at a single session of this committee, has been dragged through the slough of party politics until, soiled and disfigured, it has forfeited the respect of its friends, and provokes the mingled astonishment and derision of the business world. What were we asked to do? The Secretary of the Treasury in his last annual report informed the House that on the 1st day of November, just passed, there were outstanding bonds of the Government amounting to $687,350,600, which would be redeemable on or about the 1st day of July next; that the surplus revenue accruing prior to July 1, 1880, would probably reach the sum of $50,000,000, which applied to the payment of these obligations would leave a balance to be provided for of $637,350,600. On the 1st day of July next we shall be without the requisite funds to take up these obligations, and the Government is forced to do one of two things—either permit them to run on until they can be discharged out of the surplus revenues of the Government, or borrow the money with which to redeem them.

True, another way is pointed out by our greenback friends, to wit: the issuing of non-interest-bearing notes, a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, based on the resources of the United States, payable in nothing and redeemable never—a course marked with folly and crime in its beginning and terminating in national shame and dishonor. We must therefore pay these obligations or let them run. To permit these bonds to run is to pay 5 and 6 per cent. interest when we can borrow money at a lower rate. As the Secretary well says, "these bonds bear a much higher rate of interest than the rate at which new bonds can be sold." Authority, therefore, is asked to permit and enable the Secretary of the Treasury to fund this debt at a lower rate of interest—the simplest business proposition in the world.

Now, what is proposed by this bill? Instead of conferring upon the Secretary authority to fund this debt at as low a rate of interest as possible and make the matter a success, you propose to restrict his power to borrow to 3 per cent. on short time, and if he cannot fund for that, he is not to fund at all. In other words, you will grant him no discretion whatever. If you cannot borrow money at 3 per cent., then the Government shall continue to pay 5 and 6 per cent. One would suppose that any rate of interest less than 5 and 6 would be a saving. But it seems to be the prevailing sentiment of this House that any rate above 3 is as objectionable as 5 and 6. You will save 3 per cent. on the sixes or you will save nothing. If you cannot save 2 per cent. on the fives, then nothing shall be saved. That is the cast-iron character of this bill. And it is this feature of it which makes success under it entirely problematical. No business man in this House voting for this bill would in his own private affairs take any such stand. On your personal obligations drawing 5 and 6 per cent. interest you would borrow money at any rate of interest less than that and regard it a saving; and no business man possessed of the slightest business capacity would insist upon paying 5 and 6 per cent. until he could borrow for 3. The same judgment which would control us in private affairs should guide us in the disposition of this question. I insist that this provision of the bill does violence to the plainest business principles.

Again, before any of the bonds can be issued under this act the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay out on these bonds all the coin in the Treasury held for redemption purposes over and above fifty millions of dollars. The folly of such a proposition is apparent when it is remembered that you leave the law unchanged, requiring the Secretary to sell bonds at any discount to accumulate a sufficient quantity of coin to maintain resumption. But I do not propose to further point out the objectionable features of this question. In my judgment the effort to fund the debt under it will prove a disastrous failure. But the discussion of this matter has served to inform the country that the democratic party and the greenback party are in practical accord in their hostility to bonds, national banks, and resumption, and the effort has not been half so sincere to perfect a practical refunding scheme as to assault the credit of the Government, holders of Government bonds, and the owners of national banks.

On the whole this bill is as wise a measure probably as could be expected from a body embracing within its numbers men who vote deliberately to tax Government bonds and thereby strike a vital blow at the national credit. The debate shows that the democratic party and greenback party are practically in accord upon the proposition to overthrow the national banks and revive the old State-bank system. This bill is an insidious attack upon the present banking system—a system which, for safety to the bill-holder and adaptability to the demands of trade, stands unrivaled in the financial legislation of the world. The proposition to retire the national-bank notes and issue greenbacks in their stead, the volume to be regulated by Congress and subject to its constant tampering and caprice, is so fraught with evil as to inspire the hope that the Government may speedily return to the money of the Constitution, regulated in quantity by the supreme law of supply and demand. And, finally, the democratic and greenback parties are in practical accord in all efforts to overthrow resumption, and this bill is a direct assault upon the policy and purpose of the republican party to maintain it. But all efforts to overthrow resumption will fail. It will be maintained at all hazards. The ship of resumption has weathered the storm and outlived the gale, the waves of repudiation have hissed around it, but, safely in the harbor of specie payment, the people will throttle and throw overboard any man or party that now attempts to lift her anchor or haul down her flags.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. G. DE LA MATYR,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. DE LA MATYR said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: This debate has taken a wide range. It has embraced the entire field of finance. The bill to fund that part of the public debt soon due in long-time interest-bearing bonds has legitimately opened this subject.

The obvious fact that funding is sought mainly to furnish a continued basis for the issuing of currency by national-bank corporations has inspired this long and heated discussion. The confusion into which the modifications proposed to the bill and the debate upon them have thrown the House exhibits our inexplicable monetary system. It is cumbrous, immensely costly, and unstable "like the sea when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt." There will be no peace until it is radically changed.

My opposition to this bill is mainly because of its relations to the national banking system. I regard that system as the sum of all financial villainies. I shall oppose all measures which minister in any way to its support or continuance.

By influencing Congress to make a fatal blunder in an exception to the legal-tender power of the greenbacks, thereby causing them to depreciate in relation to gold, and by securing the issue of interest-bearing bonds to form a loan for them to issue currency for the people, the bankers enriched themselves immensely out of the waste and misery of our civil war.

By persuading the Government to refuse to receive its notes which it made legal tender for private debts, and suffering money-loaners to refuse to receive it for interest on the money loaned the Government, they caused the price of gold in Treasury notes to range from April 1, 1863, to January 1, 1864, from $1.30 to $1.60, averaging $1.45.

During this time sixty-six banks were organized, with a capital stock of $7,188,393, making a profit to the bankers of	$2,322,388 00
From January 1, 1864, to January 1, 1865, five hundred and eight banks were organized, with a capital of $86,782,802. The average price of gold was $2.10, making a profit to the bankers of	47,729,542 90
From January 1, 1865, to January 1, 1866, one thousand and five banks were organized, with a capital of $306,374,404. The price of gold averaged $1.69½, making a profit to the bankers of	107,484,228 60
From January 1, 1866, to January 1, 1867, one hundred and thirty-one banks were organized, with a capital of $22,315,163. The price of gold averaged $1.42, making a profit to the bankers of	6,694,548 90
From January 1, 1867, to January 1, 1870, the increase of capital was $10,316,886; currency was worth 70 per cent. The banks made a profit of	3,095,068 80
Making the aggregate of profit	167,325,777 20

Showing the absolute profit made on the investment to have been more than four times the capital of the Bank of the United States, when it controlled the Senate, Congress, and the money of the Union, and more than $17,000,000 more than the entire capital of the Bank of England, which controls the finances of the British Empire.

Not contented with this enormous bounty, the United States was forced to obligate the people to exempt all of the bonds from taxation and to pay interest in gold on the face of the bonds, namely:

On United States bonds to secure circulation	$392,563,300
United States bonds to secure deposits	17,753,650
United States bonds for reserve	24,517,059
Total	434,834,009

In addition to this enormous profit the national banks have drawn interest out of the people on $350,000,000 of currency loaned them by the Government. The account stands thus:

Investment (in specie)	$197,508,239
Receipts—United States bonds	$434,834,009
National-bank currency	350,000,000
Making the sum on which they received interest	784,834,009
The interest received has been as follows:
On United States bonds	$39,135,060 81
On national-bank currency	33,250,000 00
Total	72,385,060 81

This is not all. The Government not only lent the banks its credit, so that they at once drew to their vaults deposits which have averaged $600,000,000, but they gave the banks the chartered right to loan these deposits. So that the aggregate of their loans have averaged the sum of $783,250,000, which makes the amount of their loan on their deposits $433,250,000, which at 9¼ per cent per annum—that being the percentage the Comptroller of the Currency reports the banks to have realized on their loans—makes the annual sum of their interest on their deposits $38,922,500. So that the national-bank interest account on an investment of $197,508,239 is demonstrated to be as follows:

On United States bonds	$39,135,060 81
On national-bank bills	33,250,000 00
On national-bank deposits	38,992,500 00
Total	111,377,560 81

or more than 50 per cent. annual profit.

Nor does this give the full measure of the most infamous privileges these chartered cormorants are enjoying.

They were made agents of the Government to sell bonds, given the right to sell, exchange, and do all the discounts the most favored bank charters ever allowed; and, beyond this, there is still another feature of their profits which should not be overlooked, namely, the premium on their bonds, which to-day, at the lowest figures reported in the money markets, amounts to an additional sum of $21,184,254, which, deducted from the actual investment, shows that the investment of capital is only $176,323,985, on which their interest annually received is $111,377,560.81, or about 65 per cent.

But, sir, there is a still darker phase of this infamous system. These private corporations have control of the volume of the currency, and can inflate and contract it at pleasure, and thereby change all prices.

In June, 1866, there was afloat Treasury notes, paid to the Army and for supplies, as follows:

Demand notes	$272,162
United States notes, (greenbacks)	400,619,206
Temporary loan, (ten-day notes)	120,176,196
One and two year Treasury notes	3,459,230
Certificates of indebtedness	26,391,000
Postal currency	7,030,700
Compound-interest Treasury notes	159,012,140
Fractional currency	20,040,176
7.3 Treasury notes, August and September, 1864	139,301,700
7.3 Treasury notes, 1864 and 1865	806,251,550

Making the vast sum of $1,682,554,080. These notes constituted a currency issued directly by the Government, costing the people only the expense of printing. It caused intense industrial enterprise. It set all the people at work creating wealth and inspired the devotion of capital and skill to preparing for larger production and creating facilities for transportation. It enabled producers to do a cash business and evade the ruin which large interest is sure sooner or later to cause. Notwithstanding the measureless wastes of the war, that activity in creating wealth made the country prosperous as never before. That prosperity was real and not balloonish, as it is so flippantly charged. Every farm opened or improved, every house built or reconstructed, every factory erected, every railroad constructed, in short, every stroke which helped to turn nature to man's benefit, added to real prosperity.

Had that portion of these notes that were interest-bearing been refunded in greenbacks as they became due, and been made legal tender, that prosperity would have continued and we should now have no bonded debt to refund.

But, sir, at the dictation of bankers, and under the same inspiration which is impelling the passage of this bill, those notes were refunded in long-time interest-bearing bonds, so that in June, 1873, there remained:

Demand notes	$79,967
United States notes (greenbacks)	356,000,000
Temporary loan (ten-day notes)	78,560
One and two year notes	142,105
Certificates of indebtedness	678,000
Compound-interest notes	479,400
Fractional currency	44,799,365
7.3 Treasury notes	274,100
Total	402,531,497

Amount of contraction in seven years, $1,280,022,583. This amount was taken out of the channels of trade. The active business men of the country being embarked on large productive enterprises in which immense capital was invested, were forced to fill its place with notes and mortgages bearing ruinous rates of interest.

This contraction of currency in the interest of this infamous system caused the paralysis of industry which has resulted in far more poverty and misery than the war produced, and has loaded our sources of wealth with about twenty billion dollars of debt, on which the product of labor is paying at the lowest estimate $1,400,000,000 annual interest. This brief statement presents the reason for my opposition to the present system.

But, Mr. Chairman, I did not rise to elaborate a speech in my own language, but rather to adopt the language of an address to the Congress and people of the United States upon this and kindred subjects, so wise and timely, that I desire it may receive the wide circulation that is given utterances made in this House. I am certain that nothing I could say would compare with it in weight or influence. It is by the venerable and venerated Peter Cooper, who has devoted a long life and unsurpassed business abilities to creating—not absorbing—wealth; who has given employment to thousands of laborers, and has so wisely and generously directed their toil as to secure for them a competence while he amassed a fortune for himself; and who is spending the serene evening of his days in planning and executing beneficence on a scale scarcely ever surpassed by a private individual. He says:

Feeling desirious of doing what I can to promote the general welfare and happiness of the masses of the people and to secure the permanent prosperity of our country, I trust you will receive kindly and consider thoughtfully the few facts, observations, and suggestions I have to make in this my latest appeal to the American people.

I propose to show in this paper some of the causes of the many blessings we as a people enjoy, and point out the evils that will follow our failure as a nation to act wisely in the "establishment of" justice by securing proper legislation and by the execution of constitutional laws.

I feel that there is a tremendous responsibility now resting upon those who are chosen by the people to make and execute the laws of this country. We have but recently recovered from the devastation and ruin caused by a civil war, which shook the country from its center to its sea-coast, and which put the experiment of self-government by the people to its severest test. Out of that war we have come, like gold from the fire, purified and improved, with the principles of a free government firmly implanted on every foot of American soil, but with, I regret to say, the enemies of such a government still lurking in our midst.

During the last three years we have been wonderfully blessed as a nation by a succession of bountiful crops, and that, too, at a time when other nations have suffered from foreign wars, bad crops, and from fevers, floods, and famine.

The large increase in the volume of our currency, resulting from the sale of our products and the importation of foreign coin and bullion, supplemented by the products of our own mines and by a marked increase in the notes of our national banks, has placed us as a nation on a most dangerous elevation of prosperity.

I see clearly, however, forces now at work that are directly calculated to check the wonderful prosperity we are now enjoying, and, if those forces are continued, will soon develop a condition of affairs as bad if not worse than that which followed the panic of 1873. It is now our privilege to avoid such results by adopting such a national policy as will establish justice as the true and only means that can secure the blessing of liberty and permanent prosperity to ourselves and our posterity.

How can this be done?

AN AMERICAN SYSTEM OF PUBLIC WORKS.

May we not now learn a valuable lesson from the Government of France, that would if profited by carry our country safely to the highest pinnacle of prosperity and greatness among the nations of the earth?

On the 16th of August last, M. de Freycinet, formerly minister of public works in France, said: "We are giving the greatest stimulus to public works. The programme drawn up, and the execution of which I was able to commence, I have handed over, not without a pang, to a man imbued with my ideas. The progress from year to year is reckoned by hundreds of millions of francs in proportion as workshops are filled up and multiplied. In 1877, the starting year, I expended one hundred millions; in 1879, two hundred millions; this year we are expending three hundred; next year we shall exceed four hundred millions. In 1884 we shall exceed five hundred millions, and we shall keep at that level to the end, which will be about the year 1890. While making this enormous work we are effecting on a large scale remissions of taxes; that is to say, our outlay is increasing while we seem to be diminishing our receipts. In the year just elapsed we have asked the Chambers, which voted them with patriotic eagerness, for one hundred millions of remissions, but we are quite sure that the country will give them back to us in the shape of increased consumption, for this country is admirable; with it nothing is lost. Every facility granted to it is immediately transformed into fresh effect and fresh progress. The situation is grand at home and abroad. Abroad it is peace; peace without boasting, as without weakness. At home it is calmness, security, industry, and a financial prosperity without precedent; a commercial and industrial activity excelling all calculations; a material order which nothing disturbs, and which rests not only on the firmness of the government, but what is much better, on the wisdom of the population."

If France can safely and profitably thus carry on an extensive system of public works, why cannot the Government of the United States do the same? The public debt of France is $4,695,000,000, which is nearly $300,000,000 more than twice the amount of the debt of the United States. Her annual expenditures are $592,000,000, while ours is but $265,000,000. Her population is 37,000,000, while ours is 50,000,000. Her territory has an area not so large as the State of Texas. Her revenues under the system of public works inaugurated are $583,000,000, while ours is but $273,000,000. She has no mines of the precious metals of any great value, while ours are the richest in the world.

If France, then, with such a debt and area and population can carry on a vast system of public works and have her revenues increased and her taxes lightened, what may we not do under a sound financial system? The large volume of currency in France is one of the secrets of her success. She has about $1,600,000,000 of coin and $473,000,000 of bank currency, making nearly $55 per capita of her population.

France resorted to the issue of rentes or bonds to get money to construct her public works. She has few savings-banks of any kind.

Why cannot the United States adopt a system of finance that would enable our Government to inaugurate a system of public works on a grander scale than that of France without resorting to the issue of a small bond or in increasing the taxes of the people in the smallest degree? We think it can be done.

A RAILROAD TO MEXICO.

Among the needed public works, that of a railroad to Mexico has been presented for the consideration of our Government. It is one of unbounded importance, both to Mexico and our own country.

I have read with the most profound interest the account given by Signor Romero, and also the valuable opinion expressed by General Grant, as to the very great advantages that must result by a system of railroads that will make it for the interest of both countries to exchange a vast variety of their products with each other.

These great national advantages can only be secured by a railroad that will connect the City of Mexico with the railroads of our own country. Such a railroad should be built by our Government without delay in the best manner, without the issue of bonds for any part of the work.

A plan for the road should be adopted and presented by men who will agree to build the road and furnish complete all parts of the work by contract, to be paid for in cash, without the issue of bonds.

HOW CAN WE OBTAIN MONEY FOR SUCH PUBLIC WORKS?

How can the money be obtained to build the Mexican railroad and to complete other public works the nation requires? is the question.

To answer this question in brief, I would say let Congress restore to the people the lawful money it has wrongfully taken from them since the war, and in place of which interest-bearing bonds have been issued. Let the currency of the national banks be withdrawn and United States Treasury notes, made receivable for all forms of taxes, duties, and debts, be issued to take its place.

A gentleman who has built more than one thousand miles of railroads in this country under contract says he will take a contract, and give good security for its faithful performance, to build a double-track, narrow-gauge road from the Atlantic to the Pacific, with steel rails, depots, side-tracks, and the requisite rolling-stock for $30,000 per mile. Estimating the distance at three thousand miles, the aggregate cost of such a road would be less than $100,000,000.

The Government has given as a subsidy to the banks in bank-notes—that they have rendered no equivalent whatever in labor for—money enough to build three of these railroads across the continent, and have a balance of $50,000,000 to build a branch road to Mexico. If the Government would substitute United States Treasury notes for the notes of the national banks, and use those Treasury notes to build railroads, it would construct, without cost to the people, three double-track railroads across the continent, and, in my opinion, it would be a very practical thing to do.

The money to make these improvements will be easily secured as soon as our Congress can be induced to re-enact the law that was passed by the House of Representatives, after the most mature deliberation, as an act of common justice then and now due to the American people—a people who had nobly furnished all the means that had enabled our Government to save for us the life of our nation. It will now only require the exercise of the inherent sovereign right and power of the people's government, as set forth in our Constitution and code of laws—laws that were expressly designed to establish justice, secure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.

These blessings have all been placed in jeopardy by the enactment of a train of unjust, unconstitutional financial laws—laws that were passed by and under the influence of men legislating in their own interest—in direct violation of a law of Congress signed by George Washington and John Adams. Those laws declare that "any person holding any office or any stock in any institution of the nature of a bank for issuing or discounting bills, or notes payable to bearer or order, cannot be a member of this body while he holds such office or stock."

This law was passed December 19, 1773, with but two dissenting votes. In direct violation of this law, the bankers have controlled both Houses of Congress, passed laws to convert the people's lawful money into bonds, which bonds they purchased at one-half their face value in coin, and on which they are now receiving 90 per cent. in bank-notes, an inferior currency, which is especially issued for the benefit of bankers, and which are a direct tax upon the people. All these blessings provided for in our Constitution and code of laws may be secured to our country, and at the same time prove the most ready means for obtaining the money not only to build the Mexican road and make other public improvements, but to place our coast-line cities in condition for defense against a few foreign iron-clads that can lay our cities under a contribution at any time.

THE FIRST CURRENCY BILL.

The first currency bill passed by the House of Representatives was intended to legalize in the fullest possible manner the United States Treasury notes—the people's money—for which value was given by the people to the Government in labor and property for every dollar put in circulation.

The passage of this bill called forth a grateful acclaim from all parts of our country, and would have become the law of the land but for the combined power of brokers and bankers of our own and other countries. Thus a power was brought to bear upon the Senate an influence to deprive the money thus issued of the power to pay interest on the public debt and duties on foreign imports. The combined influence of this vast moneyed power was found sufficient to defeat the passage of the law as first presented, a law that would have been to our country of value sufficient to more than compensate for the cost of war. Such an amount of the people's legal money as was actually found circulating without cost to the Government or the people, at the close of the war, could have been and now should be made, for our country, an unfluctuating measure, of all values, for all coming time, and thus have secured for our country, by positive law, a national currency that should never be increased or diminished, except as per capita, with the increase of the inhabitants of our country.

Such a currency General Grant in his message to Congress says "was the best that our country had ever possessed, and no more in circulation than was necessary for the dullest period of the year." Such a currency Secretary Sherman, when Senator in 1869, said "every citizen of the United States had conformed his business to the 'legal-tender clause' of the law regulating the currency of our country." Such a currency President Hayes says, in his last message, was "authorized as a war measure, made necessary by the exigencies of the conflict in which the United States was then engaged. The preservation of the nation's existence required, in the judgment of Congress, an issue of legal-tender paper money. That it served well the purpose for which it was created is not questioned."

And such a currency, as is stated in Secretary Sherman's last report, "in form, security and convenience, is the best circulating medium known. The superior convenience of which makes a greater demand for it than for coin, the legal-tender quality of which when first issued was essential to its value and circulation, and which now makes their value equal to coin and of ready circulation in any of the marts of the world, and which is still the choice of the people."

Such a currency should be, by law, legally on a par with gold and silver at its present value, weight, and fineness. Such a currency would be as uniform in its purchasing power as the yard-stick or pound weight.

Such a currency would bind our Union of States in a bond of mutual interest, and would do more to heal the wounds between the North and South than any and all other measures that can be devised.

CONSTITUTIONAL MONEY.

The Constitution of the United States expressly declares that Congress shall have power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and that no State shall have the right to make anything but gold and silver coin a legal tender for debts; no rights or privilege granted to any State, or corporation, or bank, or body of men to make legal money. Congress should exercise its powers and perform its duties to the people by giving them a uniform currency composed of gold and silver coin and a paper currency of United States Treasury notes made legally receivable for all forms of taxes, duties, and debts. It could readily be kept at par with coin by being kept at the option of the Government, redeemable in coin or receivable by the Government, in exchange for Government obligations, on which a rate of interest is paid that would keep its value at all times equal to coin. The advice of Jefferson should be followed when he said, "all bank currency should be suppressed and the currency restored to the people, to whom it belongs." Such a currency put in circulation among the people would be the means of relieving the country from the enslavement of the national debt.

This currency could be used to pay off our national bonds in exact conformity with the agreement under which the bonds were issued, giving the bondholders their choice to take their pay in gold, silver, or paper, at their option. When our national debt has been paid, the restoration of the people's money, which was wrongfully taken from them by the banker and bondholder since the war was over, and the amount of bonds that is now unjustly freed from bearing any part of the public burdens, is again returned to the channels of trade in money; that money will seek investments in various ways that will secure a safe and reasonable rate of interest and bear its proportion of taxation, and all the people will be greatly benefited by the change.

POST-OFFICE SAVINGS-BANKS.

We are rejoiced to learn that a measure of so vast importance to the people as that of post-office savings-banks is receiving the consideration of officers of the Government. The Postmaster-General in his last report calls the attention of the Government to this subject in the following language:

"One of my predecessors, some years since, recommended the incorporation into the Department of a system of postal savings. The system has, from time to time, occupied the attention of Congress. For several years the system has been in operation in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and in Canada. When in London recently, Her Majesty's postmaster-general kindly gave me facilities for observing the management of his department. I learned that the postal savings system had been remarkably successful, and had constantly grown in popular favor. As managed in that country it is a source of some profit to the government. In this country I incline to the belief that the system would have advantages even greater than in a compact population like that of Great Britain. In by far the larger portion of the United States there are no savings depositories, and are not likely to be. To people of these parts the use of the post-office for this would be a real boon. It would be an additional advantage that deposits would be available at any depository office in the United States—an important consideration with a people so migratory as ours. It is believed that the system would interfere little with the business of savings-banks, but would absorb funds not now deposited in them. Nor would the patronage of the Government be sensibly increased, since the system would be operated by persons already in the public service, with no considerable addition to number."

If post-office savings-banks are established, they will eventually, on account of greater security and convenience, become the depositories of all the people's money not required for active use in business. And this money can be used to cancel the bonded debt, and to carry out a system of public works that shall rival those now inaugurated in France, and that will make this nation the most prosperous on the face of the globe.

FACTS WORTHY OF CAREFUL CONSIDERATION.

We copy from the National Journal the following facts and figures, which are deserving of the most thoughtful consideration of every citizen of this country:

"Mr. John Knox, the Comptroller of the Currency, in his annual report for the year 1880, recently published, says that the banks now established in the United States are as follows:

National banks	2,076
State, savings, and private banks	4,456
Total number of banks	6,532

The capital of these banks is as follows:

National banks	$455,910,000
State, savings, and private banks	194,140,000
Total capital	650,050,000

These banks have the money of the people deposited in them as follows:

National banks	$900,790,000
State, savings, and private banks	1,319,000,000
Total deposits	2,219,790,000

The national banks invest their capital mostly in Government bonds, of which the Secretary of the Treasury has given them in national-bank notes $342,063,467. Now, if we take the amount of the bank-notes, which is practically a free gift of the people to the national banks, from the amount of their capital, it stands as follows:

Capital of the national banks	$455,910,000
National-bank notes out	342,063,451
It leaves of actual capital but	113,846,549

On this they hold of the people's money deposited with them $900,790,000. These figures show that the national banks are using and doing business with about eight dollars of the money belonging to the people to each one dollar of their own money invested.

By comparing the amount of deposits in the State, savings, and private banks with their capital, we discover that they are using about seven dollars of the people's money to one dollar of their own.

Now, if we take the amount of bank-notes from the total capital of all the banks, we find that it is as follows:

Total amount of capital	$650,050,000
Bank-notes out	342,063,451
It leaves of actual capital	307,986,549

By a comparison of these figures with the total amount of deposits held by all the banks, it will be observed that the entire banking institutions of the country hold and use about seven dollars of money belonging to the people to one dollar of their own capital invested.

If these figures are true do they not clearly show from what source the money comes which is now used to build our railroads and make other public improvements? Do not the people furnish this money to establish the existing monopolies? If so, is it not evident that if the Government, acting on the advice of Jefferson, would restore the entire paper circulation to the people, to whom it belongs, and would make United States notes the only paper currency, and would issue a volume sufficient to replace the bank currency now in circulation, and should, acting upon the advice of Postmaster-General Maynard, establish post-office savings-banks in the principal cities and towns of the country, the money could readily be provided to pay off the interest-bearing debt, to protect our harbors, and to do other important works which the good of the country requires? If the policy here indicated was carried out would it not place the great corporations of the country completely under the control of the people?

THE NATIONAL-BANK ACT.

There have been three important purposes accomplished by the national-bank act. The first was to supply the temporary wants of the Government; second, to use the national banks as an excuse for taxing out of existence the old, unconstitutional system of State banks; third, it was, perhaps, the best means to enable the Government to assume its own inherent, sovereign right to take and hold the entire control of all that shall ever be allowed or used as money.

The following will show the losses brought on our country by the destruction of the people's non-interest-bearing money, for which they had given, as I have said, labor and property for every dollar they have paid out as legal money, and in place of which interest-bearing bonds and bank notes have been issued. These wrongs will more fully appear by the following statement of facts:

The national-bank act was signed by President Lincoln February 25, 1863. January 1, 1864, there was but $280,000 of these notes issued. Coin that month was worth 197½, so that Government bonds that were used as a basis for the issue of bank notes could be purchased for about fifty-one cents on a dollar. On the 1st of July, 1864, there were $31,235,270 of national-bank notes out and $179,157,717 of State-bank notes. The value of the gold dollar that month reached $2.85 in greenbacks, so that bonds which were bought on which bank notes were issued cost only about thirty-eight cents on a dollar in coin. For $380 in coin the bankers could buy a thousand-dollar bond, on which the Secretary would issue for him $900 in bank notes, and the bankers were permitted to have $350,000,000 thus issued for them.

The price of gold from July 1, 1864, to March 1, 1865, during which the largest amount of Government bonds were sold to the bankers, was never less than $2.01, and the average price during the whole year, from July 1, 1864, to July 1, 1865, after the close of the war, was about $2.23. This was a period when the expenses of the Government were the greatest, and when the largest amount of bonds bought by the bankers was less than forty cents on a dollar. A thousand-dollar bond that cost less than $400 in coin would command $900 in bank notes when this bond was deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury by a national banker.

These bankers obtained the most of their bonds at the small sum of $400 in coin on each one-thousand-dollar bond.

In the year 1869 the bankers induced Congress to pass an act making the people pay them $1,600 in coin on each of these when redeemed, thus paying them $600 in coin more than they cost them, besides giving them the $900 in money on each bond and a semi-annual interest of 6 per cent.

Could a scheme be devised that would more effectually rob the people than this?

This is what they call strengthening the public credit, and giving the people honest money.

When we consider the small sums paid for these bonds in United States notes at the time they were first purchased, and recognize the fact that the parties who bought those bonds at about half their coin value procured an act of Congress requiring the people to pay them full value in coin, and more especially when we remember that the Government has given these same parties in bank currency nearly half as much capital as all the banks in the country have invested in their business, and that in addition to this the people of the United States are giving the bankers nearly eight dollars of money on deposit to one of their own capital, we are filled with astonishment at any proposition coming from any source making any attempt to lay further contribution upon the people by meddling with their money, and yet the policy of the party that has just elected General Garfield for President and who has obtained control of the Government for the next four years is to destroy all United States notes and issue bonds and bank notes to represent them.

CONFLICTING OPINIONS.

To the astonishment of every one, the President of the United States in his annual message recently delivered to Congress actually recommends that every one of the legal-tender notes be withdrawn and canceled, and Secretary Sherman also thinks that their legal-tender qualities should be withdrawn.

President Hayes says:

"I repeat what was said in the annual message of last year, that the retirement from circulation of United States notes, with the capacity of legal-tenders in private compacts, is a step to be taken in our progress toward a safe and stable currency which should be accepted as the policy and duty of the Government and the interest and security of the people."

Secretary Sherman says further in reference to the legal-tender notes now in circulation:

"The Secretary expresses the utmost confidence what without new legislation the entire amount of United States notes now authorized and outstanding can be easily maintained at par in coin even if the present financial condition should change.

"The United States notes to the extent they are willingly taken by the people and can beyond question be maintained at par in coin is the least burdensome form of debt.

"The public thus saves over $7,000,000 of annual interest and secures a safe and convenient medium of exchange."

The Secretary ventures to express the opinion that "the present system of currency is the best system ever devised and more free from objection than any other, combining the only safe standard with convenience for circulation and security and equality of value."

Now the question arises, if a currency, one-half of which consists of United States legal-tender notes redeemable in coin, and the other half of bank notes redeemable in the United States notes or coin, constitutes the best currency ever yet devised, would it not be an improvement upon this currency to withdraw the bank notes and issue United States notes to be kept at par with coin to take their place.

The Secretary informs us that "the business men on account of their greater convenience and safety prefer these notes to coin."

These notes are now at a premium over coin not only in New York but in Montreal and in other foreign cities. There has been for some months past a standing offer in Wall street of 2½ per cent. premium in gold for $500,000 in exchange for notes of the United States. This offer, up to the time of my last inquiry, had not been accepted.

If $7,000,000 are annually saved as interest by having one-half the currency in United States notes, would there not be twice that amount saved if the whole of our paper currency was in such notes, representing so much of the public debt. Had all our currency been in legal-tender notes and all our bank notes destroyed from the time the war closed, we should have saved enough of interest to have canceled the bonds. Is it not by far the wisest policy for the Government to adopt, to convert its interest-bearing debt, so far as it can be done, into Treasury notes, which are preferred to coin by our business men, and thus save the interest annually paid on the amount of debt they represent, and give back to the people which is theirs, than it is to destroy this money and issue interest-bearing bonds that increase the burden of the debt instead.

Will President Hayes be kind enough to explain to the people how it is that our progress toward a safe and stable currency and the interest and security of the people "are to be secured by the retirement of a currency" which Secretary Sherman says is, on account of its safety and convenience, preferred to coin, which saves the people $7,000,000 annually as interest, and which he declares is now, in form, security, and convenience, the best circulating medium known?

CONTRACTION BRINGS RUIN TO DEBTORS.

In the year 1869 Secretary Sherman made a speech in the Senate, the whole tenor of which was to show that a nation's currency could not be contracted without bringing ruin on the debtors and on the laboring classes throughout our country. He described in language never to be forgotten the scenes of misery and ruin that would come upon our country as a consequence of taking away from the people the legal money they had received in payment for all the labor and property they had passed into the possession of the Government in exchange for the legal dollars they had received. He declared that "the contraction of the currency is a far more distressing operation than Senators supposed." He stated that "it is not possible to take such a step without the sorest distress to every person except a capitalist out of debt or a salaried officer or annuitant. It is a period of loss, danger, lassitude of trade, fall of wages, suspension of enterprise, bankruptcy, and disaster. To every railroad it is an addition of one-third the burden of its debts, and more than that deduction to the value of its stock. * * * It means the ruin of all dealers whose debts become twice their (business) capital though one-third less than their actual property. It means the fall of all agricultural productions without any great reduction of taxes.

"In my late appeal to all legislators and religious teachers I have demonstrated a fact that cannot be disproved, namely, that all the legal money paid by the Government for labor and property during the war was, beyond all controversy, the people's money. The money having been wrongfully taken from the people must, in order to establish justice, be given back to them in the purchase of all the outstanding interest-bearing bonds of the Government, in exact accordance with the law under which they were issued."

But if the policy of the republican party is enforced, and the legal-tenders are all destroyed, and the volume of currency placed in the hands of the banks, we shall have a return of hard times, a repetition of the panic of 1873, and the bankruptcy and business distress that follow. We shall have a repetition of the events described by the Secretary in his Senate speech, and merchants and business men will again be plunged into bankruptcy, our laboring classes changed into tramps, and sore distress forced upon the people.

As I understand the subject, it would be one of the greatest misfortunes that could happen to the business men and to the working classes of this country to have the advice of President Hayes followed out in reference to the withdrawal of the legal-tender notes now in circulation, or to even have the advice of Secretary Sherman followed, and their legal-tender quality destroyed. The bankruptcy that followed the panic of 1873 was only arrested by the act of 1878, which prohibited the further destruction of the legal-tender notes. If the destruction of the legal-tenders is again resorted to, will there not be a return of the panic and the bankruptcies which followed it?

As an act of common justice, the Government should not think of contracting the volume of currency without at the same time shrinking the amount of the claims of creditors just in the ratio that the currency is contracted.

THE SILVER QUESTION.

A small work on money and legal-tender, of which the late Dr. Lindermann, Director of the Mint, was the author, contains a table giving the price of the standard silver dollar of 412½ grains as compared with the gold dollar for each year from 1834 to 1876. There was not an hour from 1834 to 1873, the year silver was demonetized, but that the silver dollar was worth more than the gold dollar. In 1859 it was 105.33, in 1866 it was 104.16, in 1873 it was 100.46. After silver was demonetized by Germany and the United States it rapidly declined in price, until now the bullion in the silver dollar is only 88 cents in gold.

The coining of the silver dollar was practically stopped for years, for the reason that silver was exported about as fast as it was coined. Gold was our only standard, because it was the cheapest coin.

Silver, like gold, was a legal-tender during the time that the public debt was contracted. The Government has a perfect right to pay all its debts in silver.

This point is admitted even by Secretary Sherman himself.

It would save 12 per cent. to the people to purchase silver bullion, coin it, and pay off the bonds, rather than pay them in gold. Considering the enormous profits made by the bondholders by purchasing their bonds in greenbacks, why should not the people have the benefit of paying the debt in silver? The legal tender should not be restricted to gold coin alone. The people should demand both gold and silver as money, unlimited coinage, the mints to be kept constantly running, and that as many United States notes should be issued as was found in circulation at the close of the war, as can be kept at par with coin, and that this should be the permanent policy of the Government.

Are not the bankers a little too exacting when they refuse to receive the silver dollar on deposit like other lawful money and in payment of the principal and interest on these bonds, when for forty out of the last forty-six years of this country's history that same silver dollar has been at a premium over the gold dollar?

The amount of silver obtained from our mines annually is about equal to that of gold. If both of these metals when coined are made lawful money, it gives the people two reservoirs to draw from instead of one, and inevitably gives twice the supply we should have if only one was used.

The business interests of the country require a large volume of money. The people are everywhere in debt. With only gold coin a legal tender, the debtors are at the mercy of the creditors.

It is the business men of the country who are in debt. Make only gold coin a legal tender, and you send most of these men into bankruptcy. Make both gold and silver, and have all our paper currency United States notes, all of which are lawful money, and the business men will have three resources to draw from instead of one, and it will enable them to pay their debts and give them business prosperity instead of bankruptcy.

CLASS LEGISLATION.

All of the financial laws that have been passed during the last fifteen years have been in the interest of the moneyed class which has been, and is, producing in this country a like concentration of wealth to that which was produced in England after a paper money had secured for their country the greatest prosperity ever known.

The British Government, after their terrible war with France, in their efforts to obtain specie payments by contraction, plunged their country into a ruin that the historians—Doubleday and Sir Archibald Allison—said "actually passed five-sixths of the real estate of England out of the possession of the great mass of the people into the hands of the few who had the coin to buy up the property at the ruinous prices at which it was compelled to be sold."

If those who contract debts with a large volume of money and high prices have these debts to pay with a small volume of money and low prices, it inevitably leads to the bankruptcy of the debtors.

A similar effort to obtain specie payments has been forced in this country by taking out of the legal currency of the country the United States notes, the people's money, that amounted to $58 per capita at the close of the war, and reducing the same to some $16 per capita at the present time.

This suicidal policy has cost our country the loss of our steam marine, which would not have taken place if the prosperity of our country had not been broken up by a cruel financial measure that took from the people the very life-blood of the trade and commerce of our country. This outrage on the people's rights has cost the American people, by the shrinkage of values and stagnation of business, more than ten thousand millions of dollars, besides having made bankrupts of tens of thousands of the best and the most enterprising men of our country, and has handed their property over to the money-lenders who have been enforcing this policy.

In direct opposition to the law passed on the 2d of December, 1793, signed by George Washington and John Adams, forever forbidding bank stockholders from becoming members of Congress, a late Congress was composed of one hundred and twenty bankers, ninety-nine lawyers, fourteen merchants, thirteen manufacturers, seven doctors, four mechanics, and not a single farmer or day laborer. This is agreeable to a statement made by Moses W. Field, M. C.

Is it not apparent, when Congress is so largely composed of bankers and lawyers, who represent but a small fraction of the people, and contains so few farmers, laborers, and mechanics, who compose the bulk of the population, that the legislation secured will be more in the interest of those who make the laws than in that of the people they are supposed to represent? Is it any wonder that the financial laws of the country are all made in the interest of those whose occupation it is to deal with money, and not for the benefit of the masses of the people?

THE VOLUME OF CURRENCY.

The American people do not fully realize the importance of having a uniform and unfluctuating volume of currency kept constantly in rapid circulation in the country.

It is a well-established law, recognized by all writers on political economy, that other things being equal the prices of all kinds of property and the wages of the working classes will increase just in the ratio of the increase of the volume of currency, and that such prices diminish just in the ratio that the volume of money is diminished. Such being the case, is it not apparent that in order to establish justice between debtors and creditors it is of vast importance that the volume of currency should be uniform and unfluctuating, so that prices will be correspondingly uniform and steady, and the business enterprises will thus remain in a steadily prosperous condition and exact justice be established between debtor and creditor?

We are told by men interested in banking institutions that the volume of currency should be regulated by the laws of trade, and that it would be a dangerous experiment to trust to Congress the power to regulate the volume of money. If the laws of trade only had the regulation of the volume of currency, the operation of those laws would simply contract that volume when the balance of trade was against us, and increase its volume when it was in our favor, and the result would be to equalize the prices of products between all countries with which we do business. The money would naturally flow to that country where the products are the highest, a surplus of importation would soon reduce the prices of those products, and the currency would then set in another direction.

But, independent of the laws of trade, the banks have had far more to do with the increase and decrease of the volume of currency than anything else.

There has seldom been a period when there was much restriction to the issue of bank notes. When these notes are issued on a coin basis the effect on an increase of prices is just the same as though so much coin was put in circulation. As a result of this prices advance rapidly, foreign importations increase, the coin leaves the country, the banks are not able to redeem their notes, and all debts contracted in bank currency on inflated prices become payable in coin, and widespread bankruptcy follows. An examination of the issue of bank notes during the history of the Government will reveal the fact that inflation and prosperity followed by contraction and bankruptcy have followed each other with almost as much certainty as the changes of the seasons.

The finance report for 1876 contains a table which shows that during the four years following the closing up of the first United States Bank there was an inflation of bank notes amounting to $81,000,000. This inflation culminated in the panic of 1815. Within four years after there was a contraction of $65,000,000. During the seven years previous to the panic of 1837 there was an inflation of bank notes amounting to $87,961,990. Within one year there was a contraction of $33,046,980, and during the six years from 1837 to 1843 there was a contraction of bank notes amounting to $90,643,182. From 1843 to 1854 there was an inflation of bank notes amounting to $166,133,214, and in 1856 they contracted $59,636,974. The panic of 1857 followed this. This is the record of the way the volume of currency was regulated under the old State bank system.

Under the present national banking system the power to inflate and contract the currency has been largely increased and become tenfold more dangerous than it was even under the old State bank system. This power the bankers use with tremendous influence whenever it is for their interest to do so. Even since the last election we are informed, from reliable sources, that over $200,000,000 of currency has been taken from circulation and locked up. This has been done to enable the bankers to sell their 4 per cent. bonds at a premium of 12½ per cent., under the expectation of buying the new refunding loan at about par.

One of the tightest money markets known for years is now being felt all over the country. The merchants and heavy debtors are already rapidly going into bankruptcy again, and the business prosperity is now being brought to a standstill, and, a period of hard times and prostration of industry being forced upon the people, will soon far exceed that which followed the panic of 1873.

The only remedy for this condition of things will be to deprive the banks of all power to control the volume of currency, and let that power be placed in the hands of the Government, where it belongs. Let the volume of currency be regulated by acts of Congress which will be submitted to the wisest discussion and most candid scrutiny, both by the people's Representatives and by the people themselves. A constitutional amendment, fixing the currency at a definite amount per capita, would be sure to establish a uniform volume of currency.

We are told that Congress cannot be safely trusted to regulate the volume of currency.

The testimony of Secretary Sherman is to the point on the subject. He says that "since the first issue of United States notes they have been carefully limited in amount and invested with every quality to improve their circulation. Every effort to increase the amount during the time has failed." In fact it is the only kind of currency that has ever been issued the volume of which was uniform and not subject to inflation and contraction.

If we cannot trust our Representatives, who are chosen from the wisest men of the nation, to fix the volume of currency, surely we cannot trust a more irresponsible and less conscientious set of men known as national bankers, over whom we have no control whatsoever, and who are greatly interested in inflating and contracting the currency.

REFUNDING.

The true policy of the Government should be to pay the public debt as fast as it becomes due, and not to refund it into bonds that have a long time to run, and which become a burden upon the people to pay the annual interest. If the suggestions we have offered for restoring to the people the money wrongfully taken from them are followed out, and United States notes issued to take the place of bank notes, and the money thus issued is used to pay the bonds in accordance with the terms on which those bonds were issued, and post-office savings-banks are established in all our cities and villages, there will be funds provided to pay the bonds as fast as they become due. If there should be any deficiency at any time the issue of Treasury notes bearing 3 or 4 per cent. interest, as suggested by Secretary Sherman, that can be paid at the call of the Government, would supply this deficiency. Thomas Jefferson declared a most important truth that should never be forgotten. He says: "The power to issue Treasury notes, bearing or not bearing interest, is a fund that can never fail." It is a fund amply sufficient for every necessary purpose.

The Comptroller of the Currency, on page 39 of his report for 1880, says: "Were the entire tax upon banks and bankers of the country, including the two-cent check tax, as well as the tax on matches and patent medicines, removed, the amount of revenue received by the Government from the taxes on spirits, beer, and tobacco, and from custom duties, would alone be sufficient to meet its expenses and reduce the public debt at the rate of at least seventy millions annually."

The Secretary of the Treasury, on page 6 of his last report, estimates the surplus revenues of the Government "that can be applied to the redemption of the public debt for the years 1881 and 1882 at about ninety million dollars each year."

From these statements is it not safe to say that, if there is no reduction of taxes, and if the saving of interest is also used with the surplus revenue, the bonds can be canceled from the revenues alone at the rate of $100,000,000 annually?

The amount to be paid, for which refunding schemes are now before Congress, as given by Secretary Sherman, is $637,353,600.

Is it not apparent, then, that with our present revenues we can cancel this portion of the public debt in less than six years, and that by using the surplus funds in the Treasury, and by substituting Treasury notes for bank notes, and using these to buy bullion with, as we have elsewhere suggested, all the bonds that mature next year can be paid in about one year and six months. What wicked folly, then, it will be to refund the amount of the debt where it cannot be paid in less than twenty years. With a surplus revenue of $100,000,000 a year, ten years is ample time to cancel every bond that the nation owes.

By paying these bonds in silver, a saving of 12 per cent. can be effected to the people. Instead of trying to relieve the people from the burden of debt, the Government seems to have managed so as to perpetuate the debt as much as possible. Had there been no converting the money into bonds and no contraction of the currency, the public debt might have been all paid by this time. To refund the debt into long-time bonds is to put it where it cannot be paid, except the bonds be bought at a high premium. The currency sixes are rated at a premium of 134 and the four percents are at 113.

The legislation has been to increase and not pay the debt, and all this refunding and contracting the currency is done in the interest of the money-lending class.

OPINIONS OF DISTINGUISHED MEN.

The United States Treasury notes made receivable for all forms of taxes, duties, and debts given to those who render an equivalent to the Government in labor and material will most assuredly be the best currency for the people. The national-bank notes are emphatically the currency for the banks. The issue of Treasury notes had been sustained by the most eminent men of the nation as being the safest and best currency for the people.

Daniel Webster claimed that:

"The producing cause of all prosperity is labor, labor, labor. * * * The Government was made to protect this industry, to give it both encouragement and security. To this very end, with this precise object in view, power was given to Congress over the currency and over the money of the country."

Even Ricardo, the bullionist, says:

"A regulated paper currency is so great an improvement in commerce that I would greatly regret if prejudice should lead us to return to a system of less utility."

Benjamin Franklin, the wisest of American statesmen, has learned from the experience of the colonies that "paper money has great advantages over gold and silver and is more convenient and not so liable to be drawn away by foreign importations."

John C. Calhoun declared in the Senate, (volume 3, page 83:)

"'Bank paper is cheap to those who make it, and dear, very dear to those who use it.' On the other hand, the credit of the Government, while it would greatly facilitate its financial operations, would cost nothing, or next to nothing, * * * and would give every branch of our industries—agricultural, commerce, and manufactures—great advantages both at home and abroad. And I undertake to affirm, without the fear that I can be answered, that a paper issued by the Government, with the simple 'promise to receive it for all dues,' * * * would be as uniform in value as the metals themselves. And I shall be able to prove that it is within the Constitution and power of Congress to use such a paper in the management of its finances, according to the most rigid rules of construing the Constitution.

"'On the whole,' he declares, 'no method has hitherto been forced to establish a medium of trade equal in all its advantages to bills of credit made a general legal tender.'"

To the above we append the following suggestions from the late John Earl Williams, president of the Metropolitan Bank of this city:

"I would suggest that Congress assume at once the inherent sovereign prerogative of a Government 'of the people, by the people, and for the people,' and exercise it by furnishing all the inhabitants of the United States with a uniform national currency. Surely the people, and the people only, have a natural right to all the advantages, emolument, or income that may inure from the issue of either one-thousand-dollar bonds with interest or ten-dollar notes without, based on the faith and credit of the nation.

"This principle, simple, clear, and undeniable, ought to be recognized as fundamental and the only safe and proper basis on which may securely rest all the circulating medium of the country for the sole benefit of all the people, and not, as now, for the profit of a class of stockholders, however deserving they may be in all other respects.

"To carry into effect this principle, to substitute United States notes for bank notes, take away as soon as practicable and forever all circulating notes from banks.

"They would do a strictly legitimate business as banks of discount and deposit, knowing that whatever leads to the prosperity of the whole people must be beneficial to the banks, but leaving the right where it belongs—to the United States Government—to supply the whole circulating medium of the country.

"In this connection we must remember that banks are the creatures of law. The laws which created them may, by virtue of rights reserved, be amended, altered, or repealed."

Could such a financial system as we have here introduced be adopted by Congress, it would be one of the most effective means of establishing justice, securing domestic tranquillity, and of conferring the blessings of civil liberty upon the people that could possibly be devised. It would provide ample means to cancel our public debt, to construct the railroad to Mexico and other countries, to protect our seaport cities, to rebuild our decaying commerce upon the seas, and to make all the public improvements the country requires. It would confer untold blessings upon all classes of the people by providing steady and remunerative employment for labor and insuring profitable investment for capital in developing the exhaustless resources of our great country. It would do more to bury sectional animosities and promote fraternal relations with all classes in every section of the Federal State than all the gold and silver mines of the world could do.

Should the opposite course be pursued and the legal-tender notes be destroyed, silver demonetized, and all debts made payable in gold coin, and the public debt be refunded into bonds that cannot be paid for many years, it will inevitably cause another period of wide-spread bankruptcy among men, complete stagnation of the industry of the nation, great dearth of employment and consequent suffering among the working classes, a great increase of crime among all classes, and entail such untold calamities upon the nation as would severely endanger our present form of Government. It would inevitably concentrate the wealth of the nation into a few hands, and those who receive this wealth will use it to strengthen their power and influence, even by military force if necessary.

The greatest desire of my heart is that those to whom this paper is addressed may heed the advice and warnings here given, that justice may be done to all, and that the blessings of peace, prosperity, and happiness may rest upon the whole people, and that the American Republic as designed by its founders may become the model government of the civilized world.

Loring vs. Boynton.

SPEECH OF HON. W. A. FIELD,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 20, 1881.

On the contested-election case of Loring vs. Boynton.

Mr. FIELD said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In this case the returned plurality of Mr. Loring is 113. There are one or two questions in the case that need to be determined; the others are immaterial and in no event affect the decision. The first and most important is that in the town of Groveland 138 votes were cast and counted for Mr. Loring which had on them these words: "For Representative sixth district, George B. Loring, of Salem." The ballot was the regular republican ballot for that town. It had on it the candidates for governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, auditor, treasurer, attorney-general, Representative sixth district, senator fifth Essex district, councilor fifth district, county commissioner, register of probate, county treasurer, and for representative to the General Court seventeenth Essex district. The General Court is the name by which the Legislature of Massachusetts is known.

In the notice of contest there is no allusion to the town of Groveland, and the contestant is not entitled to make any objection to this vote. If the House choose to consider it, the facts are that the town of Groveland is situated in senatorial district No. 5, councilor district No. 5, State representative district No. 17, and congressional district No. 6. The State is by law divided into forty senatorial districts, eight councilor districts, two hundred and forty State representative districts, and eleven congressional districts. The senatorial and State representative districts are numbered separately in each county. The different towns and cities that make up the sixth congressional district are or may be in different State, representative, senatorial, and councilor districts; but the only towns or cities in the sixth congressional district, or which are in any other sixth district, are, Salem, which is in part in the sixth State representative district, and North Andover, which is in the sixth senatorial and in sixth councilor district.

Groveland, where the votes in question were cast, is in no sixth district of any kind, except in the sixth congressional district. The qualified voters of Groveland would have no right to vote for any representative for any sixth district except a congressional Representative, and no right to vote for any representative except a Representative in Congress and a representative to the General Court, and no right to vote for but one representative to the General Court, and that representative is the representative to the General Court for the seventeenth Essex district, whose office and whose name were on the ballot voted.

The warrant for the town of Groveland, under which the election was held, warned the inhabitants of the town qualified to vote to meet at a time and place stated, and to bring in their votes on one ballot for all officers above named; and the only representatives therein named, as has been stated, were for the Representative in Congress for district No. 6, and the representatives to the next general court for district No. 17; comprising the towns of Bradford, Georgetown, and Groveland. George B. Loring was the regular nominee for Representative in Congress for congressional district No. 6.

Chapter 7 of section 13 of the general statutes of Massachusetts is as follows:

> Votes for different persons for the same office found in one envelope shall not be counted; and if more than one vote for the same person for the same office is found in one envelope but one such vote shall be counted, and no vote shall be counted which does not clearly indicate in writing the office for which the person voted for is designed, except when but one officer is voted for.

It is settled law that ballots are to be construed like other written instruments, in view of the surrounding circumstances under which they are cast, and that only reasonable certainty is required. This statute of Massachusetts seems to be declaratory of the general law as now understood. The law applied to ballots is simply the law applied to the construction of written instruments.

The voter must express in his ballot his intention with reasonable certainty under the actual circumstances under which he votes. Except from a consideration of the surrounding circumstances no form of words can be devised which would be absolutely certain in meaning. If the words "in Congress" were added to the word "representative" on these ballots, the words themselves would not express what Congress is meant; but in the place and under the circumstances under which the ballots were cast, there could be no doubt at all that the Congress of the United States of America was meant. The voters of Groveland having been warned to bring in their votes for a Representative in Congress for the sixth congressional district, and having lawfully no right to vote for any Representative for any sixth district, except he be a Representative in the Congress of the United States of America, must be held to have intended his vote for such Representative. He could not lawfully vote to fill but two offices of representative, and the other was the representative to the general court of Massachusetts for the seventeenth district, which was also expressed on the ballot.

There could be no mistake of what was meant by a voter of Groveland in voting for George B. Loring, of Salem, as Representative for the sixth district. In view of the circumstances under which it was cast, if the ballot were a contract in writing, made under the exact circumstances of this case, there is no doubt on proof of the surrounding circumstances any court would hold that the words "Representative, sixth district" must be held to mean Representative in Congress for the sixth district. The rule of law in regard to ballots cannot be stricter than the rule of law for the construction of written contracts. If these 138 votes are counted for Mr. Loring they are decisive of the case in any view of it.

If they are not counted for Mr. Loring, the only other disputed question which would in any event be decisive of the case is the question which arises on the vote of the city of Gloucester. Mr. Boynton's plurality in that city is returned at 532, and has been counted for him. The election was held November 5, 1878. The seventh day preceding this election was October 29, 1878. In the city of Gloucester there was put on the voting lists by the determination of the mayor and aldermen, after October 29, 107 names.

The contestee contends that by the law of Massachusetts the registration of voters in cities ceases at midnight on the seventh day preceding the election and that the registration of voters after that time is void, and that in consequence of this violation of law the whole vote of Gloucester should be thrown out. The contestant denies that such is the law, and further, if it be the law, that any such consequence follows from the violation of it.

Chapter 376 of the act of 1874 provides that the selectmen of towns shall be in session at some convenient place, for a reasonable time, within forty-eight hours of an election, for the purpose of receiving evidence of the qualification of voters and correcting the voting-lists; and that such session shall be holden for one hour at least before the opening of the meeting on the day of election, and that notice of the times and place of holding sessions shall be given; and that the mayor and aldermen of cities shall be in session on the day preceding the election for the purpose of receiving evidence, as aforesaid, and of correcting the lists of votes. Section 10 is as follows:

The name of no person shall be added to the voting-lists in any city after the lists have been placed in the hands of the ward officers, unless the qualifications of said person as a voter shall have been determined by the mayor and aldermen at some meeting held previous to the opening of the polls, such fact to be verified by the certificate of the city clerk.

Chapter 208 of the acts of 1877 provides that the selectmen of towns shall keep a register of voters, containing their names, residence, and occupation, and section 3 is:

No name shall be added to the voting-list in any town until it has been recorded n the register, and none shall be added to the list of voters in use at any election after the opening of the polls, except to correct a clerical error or omission, and all names on voting-lists shall be written or printed in full.

Chapter 235 of the acts of 1877 provides that in cities the place of residence shall, in making up the voting-lists, be entered opposite the name of the voter, and that the assessors of taxes shall enter opposite the name in the list committed by them to the collector of taxes the residence, &c.

Section 2 is as follows:

In cities registration of voters shall cease at twelve o'clock midnight of the seventh day next preceding the day of any election, and no name shall thereafter be entered on the voting-lists of cities except as provided in section 10 of chapter 376 of the acts of the year 1874.

Chapter 233 of the acts of 1878 amends section 10 of chapter 376 of the acts of 1874 by striking out the words "opening of the polls" and inserting in place thereof "close of registration;" and also provides that the mayor and aldermen of cities shall be in session until ten o'clock in the afternoon of the day when registration ceases, and for as much longer time previous thereto as they judge necessary, for the purpose of receiving evidence of the qualification of voters and correcting the list of voters, and that "after the close of registration no name will be entered on the check-list except as provided by section 10 of said chapter 376 as amended by this act." This act was approved May 10, 1878. Section 10 of chapter 376 of the acts of 1874, as amended by this act, would read:

The name of no person shall be added to the voting-lists in any city after the lists have been placed in the hands of the ward officers, unless the qualifications of said person as a voter shall have been determined by the mayor and aldermen at some meeting held previous to the close of registration, such fact to be verified by the certificate of the city clerk.

Section 1 of chapter 251 of the acts of 1878, approved May 15, 1878, is as follows:

The provisions of chapter 208 of the acts of the year 1877 shall apply to cities, and the mayor and aldermen in cities shall keep the register therein provided for: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall apply to any city for which special provision for keeping a similar register has been made by law.

And section 3 makes it the duty of the mayor and aldermen and selectmen in making said registers to give proper notices at least two weeks before any annual election, to all persons to present themselves for registration, &c. The one hundred and seven names in Gloucester were put on the register at meetings held within the seven days preceding the election.

I think that under these statutes the registration in cities ended at twelve o'clock midnight on the seventh day next preceding the day of the election, and that the effect of chapter 251 of the acts of 1878 in making chapter 208 of the acts of 1877 applicable to cities did not change the time when registration should cease in cities, although it may have given the right to correct the voting lists so as to conform to the register up to and even after the opening the polls; but no name could be added to the voting lists that had not been previously recorded in the register before the time when by law registration ceased. If this is the correct view of the law, what is the effect of the one hundred and seven names registered and put on the voting lists or check-lists in Gloucester within seven days of the election?

There is no evidence how many of these persons voted. If it were shown they voted and it could not reasonably be shown how they voted, and it was found as a fact that a sufficient number voted to make it impossible to determine with the other evidence in the case whether Mr. Loring or Mr. Boynton received a plurality of legal votes, the ordinary result would be that the election should be declared void and a new election ordered, although there is authority for throwing out the whole vote of Gloucester. If it becomes necessary to determine this question, and it can only become necessary when refusing to count for Mr. Loring the 138 votes in Groveland, then if the vote of the city of Gloucester is thrown out Mr. Loring is elected. If it is not thrown out, as the plurality of Mr. Loring as returned is 113 and the Groveland votes are 138 in number, which, if not counted for him, would make the plurality of Mr. Boynton 25, and as these 107 Gloucester names are more than the plurality of Mr. Boynton on the hypothesis stated, as it is not known how they voted, the result of the election could not be determined. Whether on this statement, if the consideration of the Gloucester vote becomes material, the whole vote should be thrown over and thus let Loring, even if these 138 Groveland votes be denied him, be declared elected, or the election be declared void and a new election ordered, I leave to the determination of the House.

The remaining objections taken to this election concern only a few votes in different places, which would in no event, it seems to me, affect the result. They are too few in number to be decisive under any view that can be taken of the case. The main point, however, on which the contestant relies is the alleged disfranchisement of her citizens by the constitution and laws of Massachusetts in violation, as it is said, of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States and of the apportionment act of 1872. It is said that although the laws of the United States give Massachusetts eleven Representatives, the State has denied or abridged to her citizens the right to vote; that the Constitution operates by its own force, and this House by resolution in the pending election case can right the wrong or reduce the number of Representatives which Massachusetts shall have, and that the proper way to do this, the manner in which it is proposed to reduce the representation of Massachusetts in this House, is by unseating Mr. Loring and by seating Mr. Boynton in his place, which is the resolution offered by the gentleman from Iowa. I shall leave to that gentleman the task of reconciling the conclusion with his premises in any manner that would not imply that Mr. Boynton, if admitted, would still be no Representative, and would not even be entitled in the catalogue to count as one.

So much has been said upon this topic in this case and at other times, although it has nothing whatever to do with the question whether Mr. Boynton or Mr. Loring received the more legal votes at the election of 1878, that I venture to call the attention of the House to the constitution and laws of Massachusetts on the subject and the facts so far as they can be ascertained. The original constitution of Massachusetts, adopted in 1780, required a property qualification for electors. The electors of senators were every male inhabitant of twenty-one years of age and upward having a freehold estate within the Commonwealth of the annual income of £3, or any estate of the value of £60. The electors of State representatives were every male person being twenty-one years of age, a resident of any particular town in the Commonwealth for the space of one year next preceding, and having a freehold estate within the same town of the annual income of £3, or any estate of the value of £60. By the Constitution of the United States the electors of State representatives are the electors of Repsentatives in Congress. This property qualification remained until it was changed by an amendment to the constitution ratified in 1821. Article 3, ratified at that time, is as follows:

Every male citizen of twenty-one years of age and upward (excepting paupers and persons under guardianship) who shall reside within the Commonwealth one year, and within the town or district in which he may claim a right to vote six calendar months next preceding any election for governor, lieutenant-governor, senators, or representatives, and who shall have paid, by himself or parent, master or guardian, any State or county tax which shall within two years next preceding such election have been assessed upon him in any district of this Commonwealth, and also every citizen who shall be by law exempted from taxation, and who shall be in all other respects qualified as above mentioned, shall have a right to vote in such election for governor, lieutenant-govneror, senators, and representatives, and no other person shall be entitled to vote in such elections.

And this remains a part of the constitution to-day unchanged.

The next amendment to the constitution of Massachusetts in respect to the qualifications of electors is article 20, which was ratified May 1, 1857, and is as follows:

No person shall have the right to vote or be eligible to office under the constitution of this Commonwealth who shall not be able to read the Constitution in the English language and write his name: Provided, however, That the provisions of this amendment shall not apply to any person prevented by physical disability from complying with its requisitions, nor to any person who now has the right to vote, nor to any persons who shall be sixty years of age or upward at the time this amendment shall take effect.

This amendment remains unchanged, and is a part of the constitution to-day.

These provisions of the constitution, if they needed to be enforced by statutes, were enforced by statutes a long time before the adoption of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution. Without going further back than 1860, it is sufficient to cite section 1, chapter 6 of the general statutes of Massachusetts of 1860, which is as follows:

Every male citizen of twenty-one years of age and upward (except paupers, persons under guardianship, and persons excluded by articles 20 and 23 of the amendments of the constitution) who has resided within the State one year, and within the city or town in which he claims the right to vote six months next preceding any election of town, county, or State officers, or of Representatives to Congress, or electors of President and Vice-President, and who has paid by himself, his parent, master, or guardian a State or county tax assessed upon him in this State within two years next preceding such election, and every citizen exempted from taxation but otherwise qualified, shall have a right to vote in all such elections; and no other person shall have such right to vote.

And this law has been in force ever since, except that the twenty-third amendment of the constitution, which has nothing to do with the question under debate, has been annulled by the people of Massachusetts.

This provision of law has been re-enacted in totidem verbis (except the twenty-third amendment was excluded after it was annulled) by subsequent acts. But the original section of the act of 1860 has never been repealed or changed, except in striking out the twenty-third amendment after it was annulled.

The statement, therefore, in the report of the minority that after the apportionment act of the United States of February 2, 1872, Massachusetts has, either by her constitution or her laws, denied or abridged, in any sense, any male inhabitant of that State from voting, is entirely erroneous; and the further statement that Massachusetts took advantage of that apportionment in order to get her representation, and then deliberately disfranchised in the face of that law a portion of her citizens, is utterly without foundation. There has been no change whatever in the qualification of voters in Massachusetts since the passage of that act, or since the adoption of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and none since 1857, (except the twenty-third amendment of the constitution,) which required every naturalized foreign-born male person to have resided within the jurisdiction of the United States for two years subsequent to his naturalization to entitle him to vote, and which was ratified in 1859, and was annulled in 1863.

The gentleman from Iowa is equally unfortunate when he speaks of the laws of Massachusetts. In his report he says, among other things, that all those citizens of the United States who are so unfortunate as at some time in their lives to have required aid from the public are by the laws in force in Massachusetts deprived of their vote. This is not the law of Massachusetts. Paupers cannot vote, but they must be paupers at the time of the election. If not paupers then, although at some time before they may have been paupers, they are not excluded from voting. If the gentleman wishes authority on this point he can read the opinion of the justices of the supreme judicial court in 124 Mass. Repts., 597, and the cases therein cited.

The gentleman is equally unfortunate when he speaks of the law of the United States as implying that the right to vote is one of the privileges or immunities of a citizen of the United States.

The gentleman is equally unfortunate when he deals with the official statistics of Massachusetts, in which he says, by the official report of the Massachusetts census bureau of the State census taken in 1875, it appears that there were 449,686 taxed persons called ratable polls—that is, of twenty-one years of age and upward. But the ratable polls of Massachusetts include every male inhabitant of the Commonwealth above the age of twenty years, whether a citizen of the United States or an alien. The ratable polls are the male persons twenty years old, not twenty-one, on the 1st day of May. He also says in his report, it also appears that there were 351,113 names on the voting-list. In this he has been misled. The number of names on the voting-lists in Massachusetts at any time has not been ascertained. This number was taken originally from the first volume of the census of Massachusetts of 1875, page 16, as giving the total number of voters in Massachusetts. If the gentleman had examined that census carefully he would have discovered that what is called therein the total number of voters was not taken from the voting-lists.

To make this matter certain I some time ago sent the following telegram to Carroll D. Wright, superintendent of the census:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 15, 1880.

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Superintendent of Census, Boston, Massachusetts:

In Massachusetts census of 1875 how was the list of voters made up, from the voting-lists or from the answers of individuals? Does the list as published include or exclude persons otherwise qualified who had not paid a tax within two years, or persons who had not the requisite length of residence? Answer by telegraph.

I received from him the following reply:

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS, December 15, 1880.

Census of voters in 1875 was from the answers of individuals. The number given in report included every native male who had reached the age of twenty-one, (not an idiot, pauper, nor convict,) and every naturalized foreign-born male, (not an idiot, &c.) The non-payment of taxes did not and could not enter into the definition of a legal voter for census purposes. The resulting disqualification being temporary, none of the above were excluded for non-payment of taxes or for change of residence within the State. All of voting age, within constitutional limit, who could neither read nor write, were excluded.

This number, then, has nothing to do with the voting-list, but is a number obtained from the answers of individuals, and includes all native-born males and all naturalized foreign-born males twenty-one years of age, (not idiots, paupers, nor convicts,) and who could read and write. Whether they had resided long enough in the State or district, whether they had or had not paid a tax within two years or at any time, and whether they had or had not registered or tried to register, were not considered in this enumeration.

Indeed a comparison of this number of so-called voters with the number of ratable polls, and with the number of unnaturalized foreign-born males twenty-one years of age and upward, and the number of illiterates twenty-one years of age and upward, so far as they can be ascertained, and the number of paupers, insane, and idiotic, will easily show that the difference between these two aggregates is accounted for. When you take into consideration that the ratable polls include all who are twenty years of age on the 1st day of May, and the voter must be twenty-one years of age at the time of the election, it is seen that only about one-half of the young men who are taxed a poll-tax for the first time in any year in consequence of becoming twenty years of age are entitled to vote at the following election in November.

The difference between the ratable polls as given by this census, that is, 449,686, and the number of voters as given by this census, that is, 351,113, is 98,573. The number of foreign-born unnaturalized males over twenty years of age is given on page 377 of the first volume of that census as 79,136, which, deducted from 98,573, leaves but 19,437 to be accounted for as illiterates, paupers, convicts, idiots, insane, and as male persons who were twenty years of age on the 1st of May and not twenty-one in the following November.

The number of illiterates in Massachusetts who, except for illiteracy, would be entitled to vote cannot be ascertained accurately. The total number of native-born male illiterates above twenty-one years of age is given on page 665 of the first volume as 3,153. I suppose most, if not all, of these are idiots, insane persons, or persons under guardianship, for I have never happened to know of any native-born persons of sound mind in Massachusetts who could not read and write.

The number of foreign-born male illiterates above twenty-one years of age is given at 31,444. How many of these are naturalized and how many are unnaturalized the census does not state. The gentleman from Iowa in his report has stated the number of illiterate naturalized males above twenty-one years old as 13,478, and of aliens as 17,966. I do not suppose that gentleman can tell from what source those figures are derived. I cannot find them in the census. But they have, I suppose, been obtained by ciphering, in the following manner: on page 377 and on page xl of the introduction it is stated that the whole number of foreign-born male persons above twenty years of age is 161,885. Deducting from this the number of non-naturalized males above the age of twenty, (on page 377 and page xl,) to wit, 79,136, and the remainder is 82,749. Deducting from this the number of naturalized voters, taken in the manner I have before mentioned, to wit, 69,271, and the remainder is 13,478, which is the number the gentleman has given as the number of illiterate naturalized male persons over twenty-one years of age. But this remainder includes persons who were twenty, and not twenty-one, being illiterates, as well as illiterates who had no sufficient residence either in the State or the district.

And so I say that the number of foreign-born illiterates who, except for illiteracy and the non-payment of taxes, would otherwise be entitled to vote cannot be exactly ascertained.

If, however, these numbers be assumed the native-born male illiterates above twenty-one are 3,153, and the foreign-born male naturalized illiterates (assumed) above twenty-one are 13,478; total, 16,631, which, subtracted from the original remainder, to wit, 19,437, which was left to be accounted for, leaves only 2,806 of the difference between the number of ratable polls and of the voters as given by the census to be accounted for as paupers, idiotic, and insane, as well as the number of young men who were twenty on the 1st of May and not twenty-one on the following November.

It is plain that these classes will more than account for this difference; and the reason I suppose is that the number assumed of foreign-born illiterates is far too large, as there is no inducement for a foreign-born male person in Massachusetts who could not read and write to be naturalized, and from the further fact that all, or nearly all, native-born illiterates more than twenty-one years old, and some of the foreign-born, are either idiots, paupers, convicts, or insane. The number of male paupers, without regard to age, found on page 451, is 2,388. The number of male convicts of all ages is 3,578. The number of male idiots of all ages is 835. The number of male insane of all ages is 1,704. The total of these four classes is 8,505; and if you assume one-half to be above twenty-one years of age, you have 4,252. The number of persons under guardianship not idiotic or insane cannot be ascertained.

There is no law of Massachusetts which disfranchises a convict that I know of, although, as the election is not held in a prison, it is difficult for him to vote. There is no statute law or provision in the constitution that disfranchises an idiot or insane person not under guardianship. On the best information that I can give the native-born male illiterates over twenty-one are 3,153, probably nearly all under guardianship as insane or idiotic. The foreign-born naturalized male illiterates over twenty-one years old who, except for illiteracy, might vote may perhaps be 10,000. The male paupers, convicts, idiots, and insane over twenty-one years old may perhaps be 4,252, although it is probable that a good many of these have also been counted among the illiterates. The total of these sums is 17,405, which is the estimated number of male illiterates, paupers, convicts, and insane over twenty-one years old. The number of persons otherwise qualified to vote who cannot vote by reason of want of sufficient residence, or by reason of not paying a State or county tax within two years, cannot in any manner be ascertained any more than the number of persons who do not vote at any election because they do not choose to vote, or are too ill to vote, or are absent from the place of voting.

There is no possible foundation for forming even an estimate of the number of any one of these classes. The attempt is made to guess at it from the number of voters as given by the census (which included persons otherwise qualified, but who have not sufficient residence, and who have not paid a State or county tax within two years) with the number of votes actually cast at any particular election.

But the number of votes cast at elections differ very much. Massachusetts is not ordinarily in any sense a doubtful State, politically. And except in the third and fourth congressional districts, there is rarely a very heated contest. Very considerable numbers of her men are absent from the State or from their places of residence, engaged in business or traveling for education or pleasure, and they rarely or never take pains to come home to vote.

The third and fourth congressional districts have been for some years regarded as doubtful districts, and in congressional elections almost every possible means have been taken to get out the full vote. The third district is wholly in Boston, and the fourth largely in that city; and I have in the city of Boston, from the register of voters, a very striking illustration of the manner in which the number of voters vary at different elections. The Boston voting-list, at the November election in 1880, contained 58,367 names, and at the municipal election for mayor and aldermen, in the following December, contained 58,639 names. The number of votes cast in Boston for presidential electors was 53,335; for mayor, in the municipal election, was 41,654. This vote for mayor was cast at one of the most exciting municipal elections the city of Boston ever saw, in which the result was doubtful, and the mayor was elected by a few hundred plurality. The most extraordinary attempt was made to bring out a full vote, yet, although the number of persons entitled to vote was a few hundred larger than in November, the vote fell off from the November vote 11,681, and the November vote, the largest ever polled, was less than the voting-list by 5,032.

This voting-list included only those who had a right to vote, which means they had sufficient residence and had paid a State or county tax within two years. It is manifest that it is utterly impossible not only to ascertain but even to conjecture the number of persons who do not vote at any particular election by reason of non-payment of a tax, or the number of persons who do not vote from want of the legal residence, or the number of person who do not take pains to register, or do not choose to vote, or who are absent at the time of the election. These numbers undoubtedly vary greatly at different elections.

This payment of a State or county tax within two years, if it be regarded as a hardship to pay something toward the support of the Government in the protection of persons as well as property, is a very small matter. The tax cannot now exceed $1, and never exceeded $2, which must be paid once in two years, and as the law now stands is a tax not exceeding fifty cents a year.

The people of Massachusetts are not unanimous in opinion whether this disqualification ought to remain or not. The main argument in favor of its removal is that in all hotly contested elections it is a tax on candidates or parties who pay the tax for the voters, and that this tends to political corruption. How much or how little force there is in this I express no opinion.

I do not propose to discuss the meaning of the second section of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States in this election case.

The laws and constitution of Massachusetts in regard to the right to vote are uniform and impartial. They deny the right to vote to no male inhabitant of the State, being twenty-one years of age and a citizen of the United States, for any causes that are not easily removable by such inhabitant. They abridge no right to vote which any man ever had in Massachusetts. They do require that a man shall register, that he shall take the trouble to go to the polls, that he shall have resided a reasonable time in the State and district in which he votes, that he shall not be a pauper or person under guardianship at the time of voting, that he shall have paid a State or county tax within two years, and if he has never had the right to vote under the constitution and has no physical incapacity, that he shall be able to read the constitution in the English language and to write his name.

The number of persons who are excluded by reason of illiteracy and pauperism are so few as not to affect any apportionment. And the number of persons who do not vote because they do not choose, or because they have not taken pains to register, or because they have not resided a sufficient length of time in the State or district, or because they have not paid or had paid for them a tax, is a number that has no permanency and varies with each election. Neither do I consider whether the general political policy of Massachusetts conduces to the welfare of her people. I think her history for two hundred and fifty or two hundred and sixty years has shown that her own people may be trusted to take care of that. Certainly it has never yet been the will or the wish of a majority of her voters that ignorance or imbecility should rule her.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. RICHARD P. BLAND,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 17, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. BLAND said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I shall at the proper time offer the following amendment in the nature of a substitute for the funding bill:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

"The Secretary of the Treasury shall, for resumption purposes, maintain a reserve of coin in the Treasury equal to 25 per cent. of all legal-tender notes outstanding, and a further sum of coin sufficient to redeem all certificates issued thereon in pursuance of law. The residue of all standard gold and silver coin there may now be in the Treasury, or hereafter accrue thereto, shall be paid out monthly in the redemption of the public debt on which interest has ceased, and upon the interest-bearing debt of the United States payable in the years 1880 and 1881. It is further provided that he shall pay out, in the manner and for the purposes aforesaid, all other surplus revenues not otherwise appropriated, and the amount of moneys thus paid shall be credited to the sinking fund: Be it further provided, That in order to aid the Secretary of the Treasury to procure the coin herein required, he shall cause to be coined monthly the maximum amount of silver bullion into standard silver dollars in the manner now authorized by law."

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall determine by lot, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, the particular bonds to be redeemed from time to time in pursuance of this act: Provided, That the bonds bearing the highest rate of interest shall be first paid.

"SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws, so far as the same may authorize the issuing of bonds for the purpose of refunding or redeeming the interest-bearing debt of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

This amendment provides for the payment of the debt instead of funding it. The debt should be paid—

First. Because it can be done in the manner proposed at less cost than to fund it.

Second. Because a national debt is a national calamity. It provides a mode for hoarding capital that should be applied to business enterprises.

Our national debt is a constant menace to the peace and prosperity of our Government. It fosters a class whose business it is to deal in such securities. They are constantly contriving to secure legislation to enhance the value of this species of property at the expense of the people. It divides our citizens into hostile classes—the debtor and creditor, the tax-eater and tax-payer. The exactions of the bondholder class beget a spirit of revolution and repudiation. When hard times oppress the people they naturally seek to throw off all burdens they deem unjust. Repudiation will be the inevitable result of our legislation unless we pay off this debt when we have the power to do so. Refunding looks to a perpetuation of the debt and not to its payment.

There is a general sentiment now in favor of paying the debt. The fear is, that after we have funded it at a lower rate of interest we will go on as before, wasting our surplus revenues by extravagant appropriations. A thousand schemes will be devised to get the money accumulated in the Treasury and waste it in all sorts of jobs. Let us look to the payment of the debt and not to refunding it. The proposition submitted here will wipe out the debt in less than six years that we propose to fund for ten years. Let us economize and pay this debt, and thus place all the coin and surplus revenues in circulation, instead of locking it up or wasting it on jobs and subsidies. Bonds, like a cancer, eat out the substance of the body-politic. Pay the debt is the demand of the tax-payers, and stop the interest. No proposition of funding will strike the popular heart with favor. Let us pay out all the coin and all the surplus revenues in the manner provided in this amendment, and the debt will soon melt away. Fund it, and at the end of ten or twenty years we will have paid out large sums in interest and still have the principal to meet.

This will necessitate a further funding—all this means a perpetual debt.

Political parties are now being organized upon questions growing out of this debt. The people are forming themselves in line of battle against this debt. We may not admit the fact yet; the question is or soon will be either to pay or repudiate the public debt. If we do not pay when we can, it will in time be the cause of repudiation, revolution, and disaster. It is claimed by the friends of the funding bill that it provides the mode of payment and reduces interest during the time of payment. But the bill extends the time unnecessarily. Besides, when it is funded at a lower rate of interest the resolve to pay will gradually die out. We will hear no more of it.

The amendment I propose will pay the debt in five years, and save both principal and interest from being saddled on the tax-payer for probably a generation to come. Besides, the amendment proposed compels the Secretary to execute the laws of the land in order to procure the coin to pay the debt. It will enable us to continue resumption and provide a coin basis of the double standard for resumption and payment of this debt.

Let this House pass this amendment and it will be hailed by the people, the tax-payers, as the beginning of a new era, a new departure in legislation, in which the rights and interests of the tax-payer have been recognized. The conflict is here sharply drawn between the tax-consumer and the tax-payer. No one can fail to see the difference in the two propositions. The funding bill favors the bondholder. It pays his bond, measured by the gold standard, if it pays at all. The other proposes no perpetuation of the debt, but the payment of it at a valuation measured by the two metals or the double standard.

Interstate Commerce.

SPEECH OF HON. W. G. THOMPSON,

OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 25, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4748) regulating interstate commerce.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In violation of my usual custom since taking a seat in this House, I rise to offer a few remarks on this bill, containing, as I believe it does, some of the most important, far-reaching provisions which we have as yet been called to investigate and pass upon. Not only are the vast interests of the railroad corporations, whose lines of road reach into every State and Territory in this Union, affected, but also every citizen; and the marvelous rapidity of the development of this system in the few years past, and still becoming more apparent every day, warrant us in the belief that, startling as this development has been, the immediate future will see still more rapid advance in this direction. The grounds of vantage seen by those expert managers who lead and control these vast corporations are not intended to be reached by slow and measured tread, but by swift-footed and determined energy. Now flushed with unexampled success in working out the problem of railroad communication already completed, and the dream of the enthusiast but yesterday ridiculed by the conservative man of progress, has become the reality of the day; and no barriers, however formidable, which nature in angry mood reared as if to discourage and hinder the movement of the car of progress, but what modern intelligence has surmounted, and the grand triumphs of civil engineering stands attested in the completed lines of railroad.

Spanning the continent, reaching from the sea-boards of the East to the Golden Gates of the Pacific coasts, a line of thoroughfares for public travel and transportation of freights superior and greater than those of any other country, the sums of money involved in the construction of these lines are great, and the aggregates stagger the powers of ordinary arithmetic, and when the sum total is presented to the mind and comprehended in such presence we stand appalled. These facts furnish those who war upon corporations an assertion, but in fact no argument, which they use as an appeal to passion and prejudice to create and foster enmity between capital and labor, where, in my opinion, mutual trust and confidence only should exist; and those who do so are not the friends of our material interests; nor have they at heart the general welfare of our common country.

No great public enterprise can ever be carried to successful completion by individual outlay. The expense attending the building of railroads, canals, and other lines for carrying freight and passengers, completing and equipping them so as to meet not only the reasonable expectations of the public but such as are demanded by the wants of those who pay for accommodations furnished, require such an outlay of money as only an aggregation of capital can meet; and because an aggregation of capital is required, if it is honestly expended and the results used as an engine of good and not of oppression and wrong to the interests of either individuals or communities, then the fact whether it is money in the aggregate belonging to many or the money of a single individual is absolutely immaterial, for I take it that I am entitled to my property purchased with my own means, and also entitled to protection in the use and enjoyment of that property, whether it is in land, in gold, or in railroad bonds, or stock; and while I claim that right and that protection, I shall not be so selfish as to deny them to any others, whether they are individuals or an aggregation of individuals known and designated as a corporation, against the latter of which so much fustian and very cheap and unmeaning abuse is vented. And it is unfortunately true that these things are indulged in by a few men of brains and thought.

With broad and catholic views on most subjects in which public interests are involved, but unable seemingly to stem the current of prejudice against corporations, simply because they are corporations, yet generally they are the trade in stock of failures in business, demagogues in politics, and charlatans in everything, who would excite a mob to deeds of violence, yet lack the courage to lead in danger. We should be able to rise above prejudice, ascertain the wrongs existing, and whether perpetrated by railroad corporations, partnerships, or individuals, remedy them speedily and effectually so far as we may. I take it for granted that it is now a conceded fact that we have the constitutional right to regulate commerce between the several States, whether that is transacted by land or water lines, for it would be a monstrous doctrine, one subversive of our best interests as a people and a nation, which could successfully interpose constitutional quibbles and legal technicalities between the oppressions and extortions of those controlling the lines of railroad and water communications over which the commerce of the country is transported, in every pound of which is involved the honest toil of the producer, as a tiller of the soil or as a laborer in the trades, arts, or professions.

No man or community in our country but has interests in this intricate question, in the solution of which the brightest minds of the experienced and honest have struggled for years, and as yet arrived at no satisfactory result; nor will it be expected that Congress can by any act fix or establish uniform rates of either freight or passenger carriage on railroads or boats; nor does the bill under consideration attempt any such thing. How futile would be the attempt to fix such rates over the various lines, aggregating more than eighty-seven thousand miles, and every year increasing at a rate unexampled in the history of railroad building. No man believes that this could be accomplished if attempted; but that we have the right under the Constitution to legislate upon this subject, and prevent wrong by unjust discriminations against individuals, cities, or towns by these corporations, and prevent them from pooling earnings, is, I take it, a conceded fact; and so believing, I shall not take a moment of time in discussing that proposition, but leave it until such times as the question is raised. We can then, in treating these varied and intricate matters necessarily attending and growing out of the present system of railroad development, extending through thirty-eight States and eight Territories, many of them empires in geographical extent, many of them almost undeveloped, with grand possibilities beyond the conception of the present age, practical and utilitarian as it is, well afford to be just to the enterprise, energy, and faith in the future of our common country which invests in the grand enterprises which open the way for civilization, and bringing the remote frontiers into close relations with the older States, creating a homogeneous people, making our interests a common one throughout the length and breadth of the land. And while we are just to these, we are called upon by every consideration to be vigilant and prompt in enacting measures to protect the interest of all others who deal directly or indirectly with these enterprises which so materially affect all other public and private interests. To correct existing evils and prevent wrong in the future should be the primary aim and object of legislation.

The inquiry now to be made and answered is, does the bill under consideration secure to the public and to all sections of the country the protection against the wrongs complained of, and at the same time do justice to the great interests of these corporations? I am frank to say that it does not. True, it makes provision against unjust discriminations by the transportation companies in favor of persons, firms, cities, or towns, for the same services performed at the same time, but does not sufficiently prevent transportation lines by this discrimination from concentrating business in the hands of the few wholesale dealers, who in many cases pay comparatively a small and low rate, while the many smaller dealers are thereby prevented from purchasing their merchandise in the seaboard markets. Nor do I believe it would be just or even feasible to compel, even if in our power, a common carrier to transport a small quantity of goods or other freight as cheaply as they would a large amount; but all should be charged alike for the same services and done at the same time. In brief, I do believe that shippers of less than a car-load should only be charged the additional rate which it costs the carrier to transport goods in smaller quantities. This we have the right to provide for. But the bill under discussion makes no such provisions, as I read it, but virtually prevents it, and prohibits any discrimination in favor of long hauls or large quantities; consequently prohibits special rates or drawbacks.

How will this relieve producers or shippers, especially those residing west of the city of Chicago, from what is now taxed for carrying the produce of the States and Territories west of that city by the lines of transportation which, however widely they diverge in crossing from Chicago to the Missouri River, have each terminal facilities in that city furnished by individual enterprise, and not controlled by the railroad companies? As I understand it, the magnificent elevators, the stock-yards, and packing-houses are the result of individual enterprise and owned by the individuals and corporations erecting and maintaining them, and in which the transportation lines have no interest or control. The fact that these transportation lines west of Chicago and having a terminus on the Missouri carry to Chicago the great bulk of the freight which passes over the lines of transportation from Chicago to the seaboard, and thus become mere feeders, and in fact supply them with the larger part of their remunerative business, and which, owing to their superior facilities—having a double track and cheaper fuel—should be carried at a less rate than those roads located west of the Mississippi River, and which they can do and ought to be allowed to do, but this bill says you shall not have a less rate, because your distance is great and your freight large in quantity—the result of such a law must be to discriminate against the producer living west of Chicago, a vast and productive territory, which to-day is furnishing to the markets of the world more bread and meat than the entire remainder of the American continent, and which will continue to do so, and are increasing these productions every year, and will continue to do so long as we have a national existence. But if you compel payment for long hauls in proportion the same as short hauls the result is to increase the rates and compel the buyer to pay less for the produce in the market, and the producer is taxed to pay the increased rate by a reduction in the price of his productions, and the much-abused railroad puts this forced increase into the treasury of the company.

I could not, with my present knowledge of the business of the transportation lines west of Chicago, invent a better plan to increase railroad earnings at the expense of the western producer than to make this measure a success. I do not use the term western producer in a sectional sense, or to institute any unjust comparisons between the West, the East, or South, but to call attention to the fact that the portion of our country known as the West is the great meat and bread producing section, besides the immense quantities of dairy products sent over these lines, not only west but east of Chicago. And I assert that were it not for the business furnished by the West to the transportation lines east of Chicago to the seaboard they would in a great measure be worthless as an investment; and they cannot afford any more than Congress can to be unmindful of the western interests, or encourage, much less demand, any action discriminating against the same; for it is a fact, which the records will show, that, immense as the carrying trade over these lines from west to east is, yet in the State of Iowa the local freight received from the east in that State constitutes only about 15 per cent. of the freight charges. And by these rates, under the supervision of State commissioners acting under the laws of the State, and as yet cheerfully acquiesced in by the transportation lines, our producers are protected against the discrimination provided for in this bill.

I am not advocating the right of railroads to discriminate against a man who ships one car of wheat from a station and in favor of the man who sends in the same train twenty cars of produce, for what I demand is a law that will permit a farmer to engage a car and fill it from the products of his farm and send it at the same rates that the shipper of many car-loads gets from the same point, and if in less than car-loads he will have to pay only the additional rate which it costs to transport in smaller quantities; and that discrimination shall not be made against any person or place for like services. And while I am convinced that all railroads, both East and West, can carry grain and other produce from the West to the seaboard for a less rate than at present charged—and indeed this is about the only complaint made against them by shippers and producers—yet while this is true it is also true that this bill does not even suggest a remedy for this evil, much less provide against a continuance of the wrong.

I have before attempted to show how this bill does directly discriminate against the western producers by giving them no opportunity to procure a rebate of rates in consideration of both the long haul and the quantity of freight offered, which shippers can now procure and thereby are enabled to pay a higher price in the home market; and that rebate, because of active competition among the home buyers, goes into the pockets of the producer and not to the railroad. But I am answered that this law compels transportation lines, owned or leased, operated as a continuous line, to carry at uniform rates, and neither discrimination against persons or cities, nor pooling of earnings or drawbacks shall be allowed. All this is very well, and it would still be better if it could or even made provisions for carrying out these reforms. I have before called attention to the fact that all the leading railroads west of Chicago have their eastern termini in that city. Consequently the contract for carrying freight from any point west of that city ends at Chicago. It is the market for all of the surplus cattle, grain, and other products of the western farm. When the cars arrive there they are unloaded, the grain is put into the elevators, the cattle and hogs into the stock yards. Eastern buyers are there to purchase both for the seaboard as well as the foreign markets. The hogs are purchased by the packers and converted into marketable meats, and from that point are reshipped on other lines of transportation under new contracts and for different points and at such rates as they can obtain. All this is done without regard to what the lines west of that point have done or may do. This bill makes no change in these things, and indeed could not, consequently, bring either relief or reform to those who have furnished this freight.

Unless we assume that the Government, because of some unwritten and hitherto unclaimed power, own the railroads, and take not only control but actual possession of all the lines of transportation constructed over American soil, and then reduce rates to suit the reform, such a suggestion, by whomsoever made, can meet only reprobation, is dangerous and revolutionary, and, if once established, would break with tyrannical hand every title a citizen could hold from the Government for the land conveyed by it. It has been accepted as a well settled doctrine that a patent from the Government is a title of the highest and best, and secures to the holder the land conveyed against the world; and this being true, these corporations, by virtue of law enacted by the sovereign power of a State, authorized to construct and operate lines of railroad, and empowered to hold, purchase, and convey real estate upon which to construct these lines and build and erect necessary buildings thereon, are thereby clothed with the power of eminent domain; and they holding the right of way from the patentee of this Government gives them an indisputable title thereto. And the power which usurps these rights and franchises could with the same justness and right take possession and control of the rolling-stock. To do either would be only a high handed usurpation, and find a counterpart and example only in the acts of the excited mob who wantonly destroy the property of others. Yet while Government has no right to confiscate property of the citizen, it has the right, and it is an imperative duty incumbent upon it, to protect the citizens of all the States from all wrong and oppression practiced by a railroad or other corporation.

Now, as our contracts before mentioned end at Chicago, how do you in this bill give those west of that city relief? The answer must be, none whatever. And I do ask that if we get no relief, leave us at least in as good a condition as you find us, and allow us the privilege of making our own contracts. It is not only the interest of these through lines to secure freight, but the main object to secure it for the longest possible haul, as such contracts bring the greatest profits. Mr. Nimmo, the best authority on railroad statistics, informs us that ten years ago it was an opinion generally entertained by the managers of the leading east and west trunk lines from Chicago to the seaboard, that they could not profitably engage in the transportation of grain from Chicago to New York at a lower rate than forty cents per hundred pounds, which would be twenty-four cents per bushel of sixty pounds. But during the year 1878 the average rate for carriage of wheat from Chicago to New York, by lake and canal, was a little less than ten cents per bushel, and by all rail for the same destination only sixteen and one-half cents per bushel; and that during the year 1879, just past, grain has been shipped from Chicago to Liverpool for seventeen cents per bushel, and at the same time the rate for carrying the same grain from Council Bluffs, Iowa, to Chicago over the lines who had entered into the pooling or apportionment schemes was, as I am informed, about fourteen cents per bushel. In this there is a wrong, remedied but little if any by the State commissioners. Nor is it in the power of that commission to do so. And while this bill does prohibit pooling, that is all. It still leaves the charges as it found them, and leaves competition to furnish the remedy, and to western producers it gives absolutely no relief.

The lines east of Chicago cannot as a matter of self-interest discriminate against the lines west of Chicago, for that would be killing the goose that lays the golden egg, and the competition arising between the eastern lines for this trade must in the nature of things, in the absence of pools, reduce rates. Nor does the real danger to the producing interest west of Chicago lie in the facts already stated. The great evil is, and for years has been, that western produce cannot be put into the Chicago market with the present railroad facilities, although worked to the very limits of their capacities. The result is that after the lake and canal navigation closes, thereby putting this carrying business into the hands of the railroads, who at once increase the rates for transportation—and this lasts for about one-half of each year—the result will readily be seen. Those who deal in grain in Chicago and store it, anticipating this rise, must pay a reduced price and ship as opportunity affords; and whenever shipped and over whatever road the producer west of Chicago has always been the sufferer, and pays from his labors the immense loss to them by reason of such action. This is a grievous wrong and ought to be remedied. But I submit that this bill has no provision in it even contemplating a remedy for these evils, but again leaves competition to work out the remedy; and indeed I am impressed with the belief that the community will find in wholesome competition the panacea so long sought in legislation, and sought in vain, and that we can well afford to encourage and foster these great enterprises by which this competition can be had and through which relief must come.

I repeat, let us be just to the railroads and we can then with reason expect that we will receive proper consideration from them. That those west of the Mississippi have already made material reductions in rates, is true, and I deem it right to call attention to this with some particularity, remembering in the mean time that twenty-five years ago we had no railroads. At present in the State of Iowa, which I have the honor in part to represent, we have now completed and operated about five thousand miles of railroad, standing the fifth State in the Union in this particular, embracing within her geographical limits over fifty-five thousand square miles, and divided into ninety-nine counties, and not one of those counties but can to-day be reached on first-class cars. Remember at the same time that the enterprising citizens of that young and vigorous Commonwealth have contributed more in proportion to their means in aid of these enterprises than any other people of the same number in the Union. They have encouraged and fostered the building of railroads, and are still willing to do so and honestly protect those who have put their money into these lines which have so largely contributed to the development of the material interests of our young and prosperous State. Their industry, enterprise, and energy have furnished a surplus of the great staples, for the feeding of the people both at home and abroad greater than any other State old or young, and after using the millions of bushels of corn in fattening cattle, hogs, and sheep for the market, she sent to the foreign market ninety-nine million bushels of corn of the one hundred and thirty million sent out in 1879, or more than all the other States together. Not claiming to be a wheat-producing State, yet she in the same year raised forty-five million bushels of wheat besides her millions of oats and barley, and to-day she has on hand, as the product for the year 1880, nearly four hundred million bushels of corn, and still larger crops of oats, barley, rye, and other seeds than any previous year, and has taxed for 1880: Cattle 1,758,078, valued at $18,326,852; horses 691,085, of the value of $20,290,390; mules 43,172, value $1,581,338; sheep 349,568, value $457,958; swine 2,465,393, value $4,871,642, and this with less than one-half of our tillable land in cultivation, and all these productions must find transportation over these roads, and our western producers expect and demand a fair and honest consideration at the hands of all lines of transportation both East and West. They ask no special privilege nor will they tamely submit to oppression and wrong.

I have said that the roads west have already done much in the direction of cheap rates. From the report of the auditor of railroad accounts, 1880, I find that certain railroads, wholly or partially, west of the Mississippi River make the following showing in comparison with the same number of miles or nearly the same of roads east of the Mississippi, and if true, and of that I have no doubt, is it not at least a partial answer to the many charges made by those who make a business of inflaming a prejudice against these railroads, for all will readily admit these corporations have enough shortcomings to answer for, even after you have placed the whole truth to their credit side, and will these men tell us where the terrible oppression comes in at these rates, and when ascertained, let us drop theories and guesses and deal with the facts:

Comparative statement of business of certain railroads for 1878 and 1879.

Items.	Western, or certain railroads wholly or partially west of the Mississippi River.				Eastern, or certain railroads east of the Mississippi River.
	1879.	1878.	Increase.	Decrease.	1879.	1878.	Increase.	Decrease.
Miles operated	12,919	12,047	872		12,716	12,364	352
Passengers carried	17,949,000	17,617,000	332,000		84,752,000	80,118,000	4,634,000
Passengers carried one mile	784,572,000	711,828,000	72,744,000		1,894,014,000	1,804,264,000	90,750,000
Passenger earnings	$21,429,000	$20,341,000	$1,088,000		$41,139,000	$41,233,000		$894,000
Rate per passenger per mile	2.73 cents.	2.86 cents.		0.13 cent.	2.12 cents.	2.29 cents.		0.17 cent.
Tons of freight carried	21,618,000	18,367,000	3,251,000		87,924,000	69,678,000	18,246,000
Tons of freight carried one mile	4,411,166,000	3,430,195,000	980,971,000		11,584,400,000	9,468,210,000	2,116,190,000
Freight earnings	$66,403,000	$60,357,000	$6,046,000		$103,582,000	$97,094,000	$6,488,000
Rate per ton of freight per mile	1.50 cent.	1.76 cent.		0.26 cent.	0.89 cent.	1.03 cent.		0.14 cent.
Gross earnings	$95,772,000	$89,031,000	$6,741,000		$164,147,000	$155,490,000	$8,657,000
Operating expenses	49,848,000	44,974,000	4,874,000		101,362,000	96,984,000	4,378,000
Net earnings	45,924,000	44,057,000	1,867,000		62,785,000	58,506,000	4,279,000

This statement is very suggestive on many points.

First. That while the ratio of operating expenses to gross earnings on these western roads is, say, 52 per cent., and on the eastern roads 62 per cent., the eastern roads have done three times the work at only double the cost.

Second. That both these eastern and western railroads have reduced their rate per ton per mile 14 per cent., and passenger rates about 7 per cent., on an average.

Third. That the average haul, both of freight and passengers, on the western is nearly double that on the eastern roads.

Fourth. That the average rate per ton per mile on the eastern roads is down to the very low price of less than nine-tenths of a cent, and the rate per passenger per mile to two and one-eighth cents.

I ask here the attention of the House to the following report made by the State commissioners of Iowa, just completed and filed. I take this as published in the Iowa State Register, a paper whose loyalty to the producing interests of Iowa no one can doubt; and in this we will find that the increase of freight and long hauls reduce rates:

The board of railroad commissioners have placed their annual report in the hands of the governor, and it will soon be published. All that part of the report preceding the returns of the railway companies is printed, and from that we glean the following, which will prove of interest to the public: "The people are congratulated upon the growing efficiency of the Iowa railway service, its growth, and the prompt, harmonious, and inexpensive solution of many difficult questions of transportation. It is shown that while there is largely increased business the rates have been in many instances reduced, the decline during the past dozen years being from an average of about three cents per ton per mile to about one and a quarter—about 58 per cent. Two instances of this marked reduction are given—the New York Central and the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific—both important lines, one in the East and the other in the West. The receipts of the former on freight in 1869 were $14,160,000 on 3,180,840 tons. In 1879 the receipts were $18,270,250 on 9,441,242 tons. Had the rate of 1869 been charged upon the tonnage of 1879, the receipts would have been $55,099,857, or an increase of $36,829,607, three times as much. In 1869-'70 the Rock Island transported 130,683,671 tons, receiving $3,587,002. In 1879-'80 the tonnage was 686,458,954, and its receipts therefor $8,035,165. The rates of 1869-'70 would have produced on the business of 1879-'80 the sum of $18,808,975, an increase of $10,773,810.

During the last three years the rate has been diminished on the Iowa division of the Illinois Central, the Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern, and the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul, as follows:

	1878.	1879.	1880.
Illinois Central	1,990	1,760	1,680
Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern	2,340	2,140	3,200
Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Louis	1,800	1,720	1,600

"The decrease by the Illinois Central is seen to be more than four-tenths of a cent per ton per mile in three years. The commissioners confidently expect like reductions in the future as the business of the State increases. Inspection of the roads shows better grades, improved track and facilities, and a steady increase in equipment, though lower rates are charged.

"There were 4,977 miles of railway in Iowa on the 15th of September, and enough was built after that date to increase the mileage to more than five thousand. The stock representing these roads is carefully estimated at $106,719,429, or $21,442.52 per mile. The entire debt is estimated at $82,164,510, or $18,719 per mile. Stock and debt combined amount to $188,883,940, or $40,363.55 per mile. We have 581 miles more of railway this year than last, and the net increase of debt is $16,452,265.57.

"EARNINGS.

"All of the roads show increased earnings over last year. The total earnings are:

Passenger, mail, and express	$6,209,386 34
Freight and miscellaneous	18,628,159 01
Total year ending June 30	24,837,545 35
Total last year	21,340,709 44
Increase over last year	3,496,835 91

The following shows the increase per road:

Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern	525,823 49
Central Iowa	167,436 79
Chicago, Burlington and Quincy	891,736 17
Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul	791,920 95
Chicago and Northwestern	684,198 79
Illinois Central	183,846 54
Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska	40,717 56
The entire operating expenses for the year are	13,982,653 77
Expenses last year	12,904,420 92
Excess over last year	1,078,232 85

"The net increased earnings over last year are $2,419,603.06."

I am opposed to the clause in the seventh section of the bill which in terms provides for the informer receiving one-half of the $1,000 penalty imposed. The qui tam actions are at best a relic of barbarism, and not favored by our present civilization. The informer and spy have always been looked upon with suspicion by both courts and juries, but when you allow every irresponsible to become informer and bring suits in the name of the United States, what a door is at once opened for fraud, perjury, and vexatious litigation. Informers under such circumstances have all to gain and nothing to lose; for the Government, in case of failure, pays the costs, and you would thereby impose upon the men you pretend to guard an additional and ever-growing burden to meet by taxation, for these costs are paid from the ordinary revenues of the Government. And have not those who deal with these corporations sufficient personal interest to insure a prosecution in all cases where they have been wronged?

I see no relief to the producer in the provisions of this bill. And while I know its author to be an honest fair-minded man and wise legislator, I have not that reverence for this bill I might otherwise have if it was the result of the committee's labors and investigations; but it is the production of the gentleman himself which by some means is receiving consideration before the bill reported by a majority of the committee. And however much I may respect the ability and learning of the gentleman, he will scarcely expect me to adopt his individual views instead of the committee's recommendations. I am anxious to have a law at once that will meet the demands of the public so far as possible, in hopes that knowledge will mature with time, and that we can, in the near future, adopt such legislation as will secure the public against all wrong. That the bill reported by the committee better provides for this I believe, and, so believing, shall support it and vote against the bill under consideration.

Boynton vs. Loring.

SPEECH OF HON. DANIEL L. RUSSELL,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 21, 1881,

On the contested-election case of Boynton vs. Loring.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I propose to offer a substitute for both reports with a view of sending this case back to the Committee on Elections to ascertain whether the sitting member in this case or any other member of this House from the State of Massachusetts is entitled to a seat on this floor.

It seems it is substantially admitted that Massachusetts has deliberately disfranchised a very large number of her inhabitants, citizens of the United States. It is also manifest that this disfranchisement is so extensive as to deprive her of the representation founded on the whole number of her inhabitants. Even the contestee in this case seems to admit that this disfranchisement is sufficient to take from her at least one member of the eleven which she claims and holds in this House. Here we have the astounding fact that this State, one of the foremost of those States which joined in establishing the fourteenth amendment as a part of the organic law of this land, has deliberately violated that amendment and has been, and is now, enjoying the fruits of this crime by holding representation here which belongs to the people of the other States of the Union.

And now, sir, it is plain that if this can be done your fourteenth amendment is a dead letter and the Constitution of the country a defunct instrument. Much has been said about the disfranchisement of black men in the South by violence and bloodshed, but it seems that Massachusetts does by her law-makers what she denounced the South for permitting to be done by her criminals.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, the sitting member in this Congress, has devoted much time to a defense of the laws, policies, and history of Massachusetts, and has made a signally unsuccessful attempt to wipe out blurs and blots that rest upon her name and fame. His glorification of his people as warriors, his claim to pre-eminent distinction for Massachusetts men as soldiers in the late rebellion, is calculated to bring smiles to the faces of the real soldiers of great war States of this Union, North and South.

Why, sir, if the real statistics could be obtained there is every reason to believe that States like North Carolina and Tennessee, which, next to Virginia, formed the backbone of the confederacy, furnished more of their bona fide citizens to the Federal Army than Massachusetts. Of course in arriving at this result it would be necessary to deduct from Massachusetts and credit to us the large numbers of our black men that she enlisted into Massachusetts regiments and used as substitutes for her kid-gloved gentry, and not one in a hundred of whom ever went into the Army, except in an easy, comfortable, and safe position. She is no more entitled to claim these as a part of her war quota than she is to claim as her own production the cotton which we produce and she manufactures. And if her talent and her culture were in the Army, how is it that she cannot send any of them to Congress; how is it that almost all her representative men, instead of being soldiers, were during that terrific strife engaged in making money and contributing to that vast wealth of the North without which the South could not have been conquered?

But, sir, I make no charge upon the people of Massachusetts. The gentleman has gone far out of his way to seek an opportunity to defend what he is pleased to call the State of Massachusetts. Nobody had assailed the State, but the gentleman, with a coolness that is characteristic of his caste, assumes the aristocracy of Massachusetts to be the people and the State. The great mass of the people of Massachusetts are laboring men and women. Her common people and her middle classes that constitute the great majority of her people are as good as the people of any other State. It is not they who are now brought to the bar of the country for a violation of the Constitution, but the minority which tramples them down by disfranchising them by thousands, and which constitutes itself an aristocracy, founded upon neither blood nor brains, but money alone.

It can hardly be seriously contended that the contestant is entitled to admission.

The legal question here is, it being established that Massachusetts is entitled to less than eleven members of this House, shall she be permitted to violate the plain mandate of the Constitution because Congress by the apportionment act of 1872 allotted to her eleven members?

It is contended, Congress having fixed the apportionment erroneously, wrongfully, and unconstitutionally, the wrong can only be righted by a new congressional reapportionment. The answer is that Congress can no more violate the Constitution than Massachusetts can, and when Congress declared that Massachusetts was entitled to eleven members it violated the Constitution, and, like all other unconstitutional legislation, the act, so far as it applied to Massachusetts, was simply null and void. Will any man contend if North Carolina had been declared to be entitled to forty members when in truth and in law she was only entitled to eight, that she could have sent forty members to this House and kept them here under the pretense that Congress had so ordered? Would Massachusetts consent that her people should be robbed of their legitimate share of political power because Congress, in violation of the Constitution, had given to North Carolina an excessive quantum of representation? Would she admit that members elected under such circumstances should be entitled to hold their seats in this House a single day?

It may be said that although Massachusetts is enjoying an undue share of political power by her excessive representation in this House, having eleven members, for example, when she is only entitled to nine, it would be monstrous to turn out all of her members, to deprive her of all representation. The answer is that if she has two more votes on the floor of this House than she is entitled to, thereby giving to, say, three men in Massachusetts the same political power as four men in New York or North Carolina—if she has thus violated the Constitution of the country in its plainest terms, then the wrong must be remedied and such steps must be taken as are necessary to give her her true and lawful representation. The only way to do this is to turn out all her members in this House and provide by competent legislation for her true and lawful apportionment. It is clear that there is no difference between the title of the contestee in this case and that of any other member of the Massachusetts delegation. There is no method by which you can select two of the eleven and exclude them so as to reduce the number down to her constitutional nine. The defect is in the title of each and every one of them, it is inherent and vital, and no man can distinguish this case from the other case which I have put of a State sending forty members when she is only entitled to eight.

It does not follow that because the apportionment law of 1872 is null as to Massachusetts it is so as to the other States. Every lawyer knows that a law may be good in part and bad in part; nor does it follow because the illegitimate and excessive two which Massachusetts unlawfully enjoys belong to some other State that the title of the Representatives of that State is defective.

The distinction between the case of a State which sends more and the State which sends less than its constitutional quota is easy. A State which sends more can only remedy the wrong by withdrawing them all and sending the proper number. The State which sends less has only to provide by her own legislation for the additional number, leaving those who have already been elected. For example, if in this case the Massachusetts members should be ousted and that State should send nine and the other two should be distributed between two other States, the two latter States could provide through their Legislatures for an election, perhaps by districts, certainly by the State at large, for the additional member.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. D. WYATT AIKEN,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. AIKEN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I have been an attentive listener to this protracted debate, and though from the outset open to conviction, I am not yet convinced that it will be either wise or economical to refund so much of the public debt as matures during the year 1881. I believe the prosperity of our country will warrant our liquidating the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds as they mature, or in too short a time after maturity to impose upon us the necessity of attempting to float a new loan at lower interest and short time. The only question, then, is, can we pay this debt? I believe we can, and will assign succinctly the reason for the faith that is in me.

The Secretary of the Treasury tells us that on the 1st day of November last there were in the Treasury $218,710,154 in coin, of which amount $141,597,013 were "an available cash balance." This latter sum had increased by the 31st of December so far as to become at that time $148,503,615. With the same ratio of increase this available coin will amount to $200,000,000 before the expiration of the present year, and would be an amount equal to the entire 6 per cent. indebtedness. Then why should it not be appropriated for the purpose of canceling that portion of the public debt? Gentlemen reply, because it is only available for specific purposes, to wit, resumption and redemption. Why, Mr. Chairman, until I heard it asserted on this floor a few days ago that it was a "delusion" and a "snare," I thought that resumption was a fixed fact. The Secretary of the Treasury tells us in his report that "while no distinction as to value is made between coin and notes in business transactions, a marked preference is shown for notes, owing to their superior convenience in converting and carrying." And he further assures us that "United States notes are readily taken at par with coin in all parts of this country and in the chief commercial marts of the world." If this be not resumption, Mr. Chairman, what is it? We are told by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] that resumption will be assured when all debts are paid in specie. Practically, sir, that time never has been and never will be. Indeed, if the monthly salary of that gentleman were proffered him by the Government in specie, in gold, to assure him that resumption was an established fact, we know very well that he would rebel against receiving such payment of Government indebtedness. To all practical purposes specie payments are maintained to-day, and the much-abused silver dollar has the same purchasing power that the gold dollar has. It will buy as many yards of clothing, as many pounds of food, as many plugs of tobacco, and as many drinks of whisky; and we all know that in the mind of the average American citizen, I will not say average American Congressman, these four articles are essentially necessary to sustain human comfort. No, sir, I would not hold this amount for resumption, because, as the Secretary of the Treasury well says, "in a supreme emergency the power granted to sell bonds will supply any possible deficiency," and he has in the Treasury authorized to be sold, but not sold, $104,652,200 of 4 per cent. bonds available for this purpose.

But then we are told this "available cash balance" of $148,503,615 must be held for redemption purposes. Mr. Chairman, during the year 1880 there were held in the Treasury for this purpose $141,597,013, and the Secretary tells us seven hundred and six thousand six hundred and fifty-eight dollars' worth of notes were presented for redemption. An enormous trap set for very little game, surely. And I venture the suggestion, that twelve months hence we will hear a similar report simply because United States notes are now in form, security, and convenience the best circulating medium known. Hence I conclude, sir, that this reserve fund should be used to cancel the 6 per cent. indebtedness of the country during the current year, thereby saving to the tax-paying citizens of the country an annual sum of $12,000,000.

But then, sir, during this same year of 1881 the 5 per cent. indebtedness of the country matures, and what disposition do we propose to make of it? Pay it, of course, as rapidly as the net revenue of the country will enable us. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that we will have a surplus of $90,000,000 to apply annually to the extinguishment of the public debt. Add to this the $12,000,000 saved by the payment of the 6 per cent. debt, as above suggested, and it will be fair to conclude that we can pay $100,000,000. Now, Mr. Chairman, if upon a debt of $470,000,000 at 5 per cent. per annum we pay the interest and an annual payment of $100,000,000 upon the principal, we will have liquidated the debt in six years and six months and will have paid out something over eighty-one million dollars in interest. If, on the other hand, we fund this debt into 3 per cent. bonds, payable after five years at the option of the Government, we will in six years and a half have paid out over ninety million dollars of interest, and the principal will remain untouched. And the $100,000,000 which we proposed to pay upon the principal annually will have gone into the sinking fund which, the Secretary tells us, will have reached something over three hundred million dollars by the middle of 1888. But then we are left with a deficit of $170,000,000, whereas by applying our annual net revenues to the payment of the debt direct we will have liquidated the entire 5 per cent. indebtedness at the expiration of six years and six months.

Mr. Chairman, suppose these millions of 3 per cent. ten-year bonds should be issued, and the various Secretaries should find that national adversity had prevented their paying any portion of the principal or even accumulating a sinking fund, how will we find ourselves in 1891? At that time $250,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds mature, and the Government would then be compelled to negotiate a new loan for longer time, and thus the people would have laid upon their shoulders a perpetual debt, which, as has been well said on this floor, is "un-American."

But, Mr. Chairman, I may be told that such strenuous efforts to pay the public debt would produce a financial disturbance that would check the prosperity of the country. To my mind just the reverse would take place. Money now wrapped up in bonds would then be free and privileged, or rather compelled to seek other investments. All over this broad country fertile lands are now lying idle that by a free circulation of this bonded wealth might be brought into profitable cultivation. In our Appalachian chain of mountains, extending through Virginia, North and South Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, and into Alabama, there are inexhaustible supplies of coal, iron, marble, sandstone, and rich mines of gold, silver, and copper, all now imbedded within the bosom of mother earth. And throughout the entire Piedmont section of country, extending from the Potomac to the iron hills of Alabama, illimitable water-powers, so majestic that one feels like standing uncovered in their presence, are running to waste, and their constant roaring sounds as if it were a mournful dirge, murmuring because the capitalists of the country would not utilize these gifts of nature.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, instead of wrapping up the people's money in the country's debt, let it be invested in the uncultivated lands of the South and West, and our exports, which are our only guarantee of prosperity, will be increased; let it build up factories on the spot where our products are grown, and we will then export flour instead of wheat, bacon instead of pork, yarns and cloth instead of cotton, and our material resources will be so developed that our prosperity will be permanent and perpetual, while our debt will be short-lived; our income will be so increased as to materially decrease our taxes, and ours will be the freest and happiest people in the world.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would say, and I speak now only for that section where can be found those magnificent water-powers and those invaluable mineral deposits, the people there are this day, with outstretched arms, extending to capitalists a welcome, and urging them to come over and help them in developing the natural resources of that beautiful country. And if, sir, by paying the national debt we could effect but this single result, I can see in it a healthful influence upon the politics of the country which would be ample compensation for the burdens of taxation to which the people would be subjected until the debt was paid; because, sir, sectionalism would then be destroyed, our Union would be restored, and ours would be that happy people we once were. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I say let us pay the debt.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. PETER V. DEUSTER,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. DEUSTER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I desire to say but a few words on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, providing that the Secretary of the Treasury, before any of the bonds authorized by this bill shall be issued, shall pay out in exchange for matured bonds all the silver dollars and all the gold coin in the Treasury, over fifty millions of dollars held for the purposes of resumption. This amendment is in my estimation a very objectionable feature in the bill. You will remember that it really was adopted by the other side of the House by refraining from voting when a division of the vote was demanded. The refunding of over six hundred millions of dollars of maturing obligations of our Government should not be trifled with. It seems to me that there is no such great mystery in the subject of finance; that whatever a prudent, discreet, honest man should do in regard to his own business affairs, is safe for the Government to do, of course, on a larger scale. Republicans as well as democrats should drop all party affiliations and unite in perfecting one of the most important measures now pending before this House.

I have been an attentive listener to the exhaustive debate on this subject ever since its commencement, and will say that the bill in its present shape, except the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, ought to pass. From assurances given by gentlemen on both sides of the House, that even bankers were ready to take a 3 per cent. bond, and in view of the fact that our 4 per cent. bonds are at a high premium, I would not attempt to cast my vote for a higher per cent. bond. The credit of our Government is, as generally conceded, better than that of any other government in the world. While other nations are increasing their national debt year by year, we are fortunately among the very few who yearly have paid a part of the principal. Our great wealth derived from the inexhaustible resources and surplus revenue, will enable us to discharge, in the near future, a still larger amount of our debt, and for these reasons the bill wisely provides for a 5-10 bond.

The same economic rules that govern private individuals in discharging a debt as soon as possible are applicable also to a well-governed nation. I am somewhat astonished to see well-meaning gentlemen advocating a higher per cent. bond, since they are aware that the same arguments were made at the time our 4 per cent. funding bill was under consideration in the House. It was then asserted that a 4 per cent. bond could not be floated. Experience has taught us differently. The 4 per cent. certificates even, designed to be issued for investments of the savings of poorer classes, were gobbled up by large capitalists as fast as they could be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury. It has been asserted over and over again during this debate that a 3 per cent. bond could not be floated. Upon what grounds are these assertions based? It has been stated that a 3 per cent. bond never before had been sold at par. Had a 4 per cent. bond ever been offered in this country before these bonds were funded? Was the issue of those bonds, which are now at a high premium, not considered a mere experiment at the time? The result is known to all of us. I venture to say that the bonds issued under the provisions of this bill will prove as good and in many localities a better investment than real estate, devoured almost by local taxation in many cases; or, show me the farmer who, with an abundant crop and hard labor, can realize a net profit of more than 3 per cent. of his investment. I hope, therefore, that the bill will pass.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN A. ANDERSON,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. ANDERSON said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: When action was taken upon an amendment proposed by me to the first section of this bill, and also upon a substitute for that section, the debate was restricted to five minutes, and I avail myself of this opportunity to present some views upon the general subject more fully than was then possible.

NATIONAL DEBT THAT MAY BE PAID IN 1881.

The position in which we find ourselves respecting the national debt can be simply stated and easily understood.

In 1861 the United States borrowed $202,266,550 by selling its bonds bearing 6 per cent. interest, "irredeemable for twenty years, and after that period redeemable at the pleasure of the United States." In 1871, for the purpose of reducing the interest on other 6 per cent. bonds, it sold 5 per cent. bonds amounting to $469,651,050, "redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after ten years from the date of their issue." Hence, on the 1st of next May the Government will have the option of paying off these $671,917,600 of indebtedness, on which it is annually paying $35,618,545 interest. Not having the money with which to make so large a payment, this bill proposes that we sell new bonds bearing 3½ or 3 per cent. interest, and with the proceeds of this sale take up the five and six percents. If we can borrow at 3½ per cent. the annual interest charge would be $23,517,116, or a yearly saving of $12,101,429; and if at 3 per cent. the annual interest would be $20,157,528, or a yearly saving of $15,461,017.

This process of selling bonds bearing low interest and with the money thus obtained paying off bonds bearing a higher interest is called "funding," or "refunding," the debt. It is exactly analogous to the act of an individual who, because of his better credit, or a greater abundance of money in the market, gives his note at 3 per cent., and, with the funds thus raised, pays off a previous note bearing 6 per cent. And for the same reason that he promotes his own interest by so doing, the Government promotes the interests of the people by "refunding." So that the simple question before the committee is whether we shall compel the tax-payers to pay to one set of bondholders twelve or fifteen millions of interest a year more than we can borrow money for from another set of bondholders. The question answers itself.

OBJECTION TO REFUNDING.

The most plausible objection to this course is that urged by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] who adduces figures to show, first, that we can afford to raise a surplus revenue of $60,000,000 annually; and, second, that we can better afford to leave the five and six percents outstanding, and pay them off in ten years at the rate of $60,000,000 a year, than to issue long 3 per cent. bonds. That is true if the Government parts with the power to pay the new bonds for ten years; but if it retains the option of paying them in five years, then it makes no earthly difference how long the bond runs after that option, whether ten or fifty years, because five years hence we could pay them off at pleasure.

It is perfectly clear that 6 per cent. is twice as great as 3 per cent., and therefore that under Mr. KELLEY'S plan we would have to pay a larger amount than under the funding plan. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] has shown that the total sum required for the payment of principal and interest by Mr. KELLEY'S method would be $826,750,000; and that if refunded at 3 per cent., and paid off at the same rate of sixty millions a year, and in the same time, the total sum required would be but $748,210,000, or $78,540,000 less. This saving of seventy-eight millions in ten years is a conclusive answer to the cry against refunding, and will be so accepted by every tax-payer in the nation.

INFLUENCE OF HIGH-TARIFF VIEWS ON REFUNDING.

There is one feature in this proposition of Mr. KELLEY worthy of especial attention. The raising of a surplus of sixty millions a year necessarily requires that the revenues shall be collected at existing rates; therefore, that the present tariff shall be maintained. For one, I favor a wise and equitable revision of a schedule of duties that was framed to meet war necessities and established in the heat of the war period. That period, with its voracious demands for revenue, has passed away. Our present necessities are only those incident to peace and prosperity, with the added legacy of the war in the shape of a national debt. However advantageous it might be for the advocates of an extreme tariff to possess a pretended necessity for an enormous surplus during the coming ten years, as a pretext behind which they could plausibly resist an equitable revision of the tariff, yet I am unwilling to pay seventy-eight millions of the people's money for the sole purpose of furnishing them with that pretext.

In this connection, as well as elsewhere, may also be suggested a bearing which the high-tariff question may have had upon the course taken by another set of gentlemen. Everybody knows that men are willing to lend money on long time at a less rate of interest than for a short time; that, for example, a bond irredeemable for ten years may be sold at 3 per cent., while if the Government has the choice of redeeming a bond in five years buyers will not take it at a less interest than 3½ or 4 per cent. The rate of interest and the length of time directly affect each other, so far as the willingness of men to lend money is concerned.

The plea for a low rate of interest, and also the one for a short bond, are strong pleas with which to go before the people, a fact fully realized by the astute leaders of the democratic party. But it is evident that the Government cannot compel anybody to buy its bonds a bit more than I can compel any man to take my note. He may be so ungenerous as to say that his money is worth more to him than my note would be. So may he say with respect to the Government's bond, and may prefer to keep his money. Hence it is clear that if we fix either a lower rate of interest or a shorter period, or both together, than buyers are willing to accept, our bonds will remain unsold, and the six percents will remain outstanding. In that event the cry would be renewed for a speedy payment of the fives and sixes, and by consequence, for the collection of the largest possible revenues with which to make these payments. The bearing of this pressure upon the tariff question would be precisely the same as under Mr. KELLEY'S plan.

The most strenuous advocate on the floor for both a lower interest and a shorter time than any government in the world has ever successfully adopted has been our distinguished Speaker and the recognized leader of the democratic party, [Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania.] I am bound to accept, and do accept, his assurances, repeatedly given, as to the sincerity of his belief that the bond he advocates can be sold. But in case he should be mistaken, in case the short 3 per cent. bond which the House, under his vigorous leadership, has specified should be rejected by the market, then, and in such a dire contingency, it is possible that his grief over the failure of this funding measure might be greatly mollified by the beneficial influence which that failure would have upon the Pennsylvania view of the tariff question. It is a very ill wind that blows no good.

A HALF OF ONE PER CENT. DISCRETION.

The chief difference between the bill and my substitute touched precisely this possibility of failure. The bill inexorably fixed the rate of interest at 3 per cent. The substitute fixed "a rate not exceeding 3½ per cent." The time in both was the same. Under the substitute the Secretary was not required to pay 3½ per cent., nor debarred from offering 3 or 2 per cent. if he found such bonds would sell; it only prohibited him from paying more than 3½ per cent. No human being can tell whether the lenders will buy three percents. They might refuse three and yet take three and a quarter, or three and a half; and the difference of a quarter or a half per cent. while important is far less important than a failure which would result in 5 and 6 per cent. The only way of positively knowing what the market will take is by actual trial. Somebody has got to make that trial. The Secretary is more competent to do so than are the able-bodied financiers in this House, whose judgment on roast beef is possibly better than their judgment on finance. And it is only the part of common sense and business prudence for the House to give a discretionary lee-way of a half per cent. to the Secretary, as a guard against failure.

With all due deference to everybody, I believe that the democratic party is determined to pass a funding bill warranted not to fund; that this bill will admirably serve that purpose, and, furthermore, that extreme views on an altitudinarian tariff may have had more to do in shaping this measure than has a proper regard for the financial interests of the people. In passing from this branch of the subject I desire to record my firm belief in the wisdom of a tariff not "for revenue only," but for the real and broad protection of American workmen and industries as against the cut-throat wages of Europe or Asia. But I do not believe, under the guise of protection, in furnishing any set of manufacturers with an unnecessarily high tariff as a cloak against the brisk winds of healthy competition. These gentlemen are quite able to buy their own cloaks, as a rule.

RETIREMENT OF NATIONAL-BANK NOTES AND SUBSTITUTION OF UNITED STATES NOTES.

As regards the amendment respecting the national banks I am satisfied that neither its design nor effect was generally understood by the committee. It provided that all the vested rights of the banks under existing laws should be fully respected; that when a charter expired it should not be renewed; that as notes were surrendered by a bank the United States should issue "currency" notes of the same number and amount; that these currency notes should not be a legal tender, and in that respect should differ from the "greenback;" that they should not be accepted for customs or be used in paying the public debt; in short, that they should have precisely the qualities, limitations, and powers of the national-bank note. Under the law the bank-note is payable in "lawful money." But as the greenback is "lawful money," bank-notes were always redeemed with it, and not with coin when the latter was at a premium. The same would be true of the proposed currency notes under similar circumstances; but until such circumstances arose these notes would practically be exactly what the greenback is to-day—gold notes. The amendment was as follows, and its bearing upon this funding question is clearly stated in the last paragraph:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue, as hereinafter provided, currency notes of the United States, which shall not bear interest, and which shall be payable to bearer on demand in the lawful money of the United States.

From and after June 30, 1881, it shall be unlawful for the Comptroller of the Currency to authorize any association for carrying on the busines of banking under title 62 of the Revised Statutes to commence the business of banking under said title; and it shall be unlawful for him, or for any other officer of the United States, from and after June 30, 1881, to issue circulating notes to any association which shall at that date be duly authorized to transact the business of banking under said title 62, except for the purpose of replacing mutilated, worn-out, or destroyed circulating notes, as provided in section 5184 of the Revised Statutes.

The Secretary of the Treasury shall ascertain the number, denominations, and aggregate amount of all circulating notes issued to banking associations under title 62 outstanding June 30, 1881; and when, from any cause, any of said circulating notes at that date outstanding shall be redeemed by the Treasurer, as provided in section 5224 Revised Statutes, he shall thereupon, and not otherwise, be authorized to issue the currency notes herein provided, of the same denominations and to the same amount as that of the circulating notes so redeemed by him; and he shall thereafter pay out said currency notes in discharge of any services rendered to or for supplies purchased by the United States after June 30, 1881.

The aggregate amount of outstanding circulating notes issued to banking associations, and of currency notes issued by the Treasurer, shall at no time be greater than the total amount of circulating notes outstanding June 30, 1881, as ascertained by the Treasurer; nor shall it at any time be more than $1,000,000 less than said amount.

Said currency notes shall be received at par in all parts of the United States in payment of taxes, excises, public lands, and all other dues to the United States except duties on imports; and also for all salaries and other debts and demands owing by the United States to individuals, corporations, and associations within the United States, except interest on the public debt and in redemption of the national currency.

The Secretary of the Treasury shall, as currency notes are issued by him, set apart an equal amount of the coin then in the Treasury, and not otherwise appropriated, for the redemption of the bonds redeemable during or subsequent to the year 1881. And the amount of the bonds so redeemed by him prior to the sale of the last of the bonds and certificates authorized in this section shall be deducted from the aggregate amount of such bonds and certificates herein authorized, nor shall he issue an aggregate amount of said bonds and certificates greater than the sum remaining after such deduction. So much of said coin so set apart as is not used in the redemption of bonds shall be applied by the Treasurer to the sinking fund.

POPULAR PREFERENCE FOR "GREENBACKS" OVER COIN.

In addition to the debt that bears interest there is a debt on which no interest is paid, amounting to $404,907,383, of which the greenbacks are far the greater part, namely, $346,681,016. Were these notes withdrawn from circulation we should then have to pay interest on just that much more debt, say $347,000,000, which, at 3½ per cent., would be $12,145,000 annually. And the reverse of this proposition is true. If it were in our power to double the amount of greenbacks we could, with the funds received for them, decrease the interest-bearing debt $347,000,000 in principal and save twelve or more millions a year in the shape of interest.

When a man accepts a greenback he lends just that much money to Government, without charging interest; and we are able to borrow $347,000,000 from the holders of these notes, without interest, partly because they are lawful money, but chiefly because they are preferred to coin. The reasons for this popular preference are:

1. That the greenback is promptly paid in gold or silver when demanded.

2. That in case of loss or theft it can be identified by its number, whereas coins of the same mintage cannot be identified at all.

3. That it is more difficult to counterfeit.

4. That it is much lighter, more safely carried about the person, and shipped at less cost for express charges than coin.

In other words, it is a more convenient "money" than gold, less bulky than silver, and so much better than either of them that people are more willing to lend money to Government without interest than they are to take coin. And just as long as the national-bank note possesses precisely the present qualities of the greenback it will be equally preferred to coin in our domestic commerce.

Eastern gentlemen may talk as they please about the expediency of retiring the greenbacks, and other gentlemen may shout themselves hoarse over the free coinage of silver—for the benefit of bonanza kings; but the fact that the people are willing to lend the Government $347,000,000, without interest, ought to be satisfactory evidence as to the demands of the business world. The coins have their proper places, because of their different qualities. For small change silver is better than gold, because of its greater bulk. The diminutive size of a gold-dollar piece debars its use. Whereas the bulk of twenty silver dollars debars their use as compared with that of a twenty-dollar gold piece. In the transfer of large sums there never was a greater nuisance than silver; that is the proper place of gold. For small change silver is invaluable, but beyond this use it is a ponderous humbug. And silver men need not imagine that the farmers of the West, when shipping vast crops to the East, are going to pay the express charges for the transfer of silver when gold can be shipped cheaper, or the expressage on gold when paper can be shipped cheaper. The very nature of things determines the proper place of these different kinds of money. We want enough of each to fill its place, and we do not want the crowding out of either of them by the others. And I conclude this digression by saying that, for just the reasons above indicated, I am in favor of reissuing a proper amount of the old fractional currency in order that the people of the West may be able to send by letter a less sum than one dollar.

WHY NATIONAL-BANK NOTES CANNOT AT ONCE BE RETIRED.

Now, Mr. Chairman, over and above the $347,000,000 of greenbacks in circulation, there are $344,000,000 of national-bank notes. The Comptroller of the Currency reports the relative proportions of currency and coin on November, 1, 1880, as follows:

Legal-tender notes		$346,681,016
National-bank notes		343,834,107
Total currency		690,515,123
Gold coin	454,012,030
Silver coin	158,271,327
Total coin		612,283,357
Total currency and coin		1,302,798,480

The proposition cannot be denied that, if we were now able to retire these bank notes and issue United States notes in their stead, we could at once convert just that amount of the interest-bearing debt into non-interest-bearing debt; that is, if we could issue $344,000,000 of currency notes, we could, with the money received for them, pay off $344,000,000 of the 6 per cent. debt, and do so without paying either 3 per cent., 2 per cent., or any interest whatever on this currency loan. I need not argue that proposition; it is self-evident.

But there are certain reasons why we are not at present able to retire the bank notes, namely, the laws of the land and the nation's honor.

In 1863, when the value of the greenback had run down from one hundred to sixty cents, and when the Government could neither borrow money nor redeem its promises, the act of February 25 was passed, giving to banking associations the right to issue circulating notes to within 10 per cent. of the amount of United States bonds deposited as security therefor. The objects of the act were, first, to make a home market for our bonds, Europe refusing them; and, second, to provide additional currency. Gold and silver had disappeared from trade, and the depreciated greenbacks and notes of private banks were the only money in use. The measure was not only necessary, but vital. Now, one of its most valuable conditions was that the charters of the banks and the right to issue notes should be in force for twenty years from date of grantal; otherwise capitalists would not have invested their money in the business, and so would not have bought the bonds required for banking, and which Government had to sell or die. None of these charters have expired, and none will expire until 1883; nor has the law been repealed. And just that is the reason, and, to my notion, a sufficient reason in the eyes of every man who prefers honesty to treachery, and honor to shystering, why it is beyond the power of this nation, so long as it respects its plighted faith, to strike down the national banks with one fell stroke.

No matter how great may be our prosperity to-day as compared with our dire necessities in that midnight year of the horrible war, 1863, and no matter how great may be the apparent hardships of the banking contract, yet it is a contract; it was deliberately made, and was a good contract for us at the time of its making. For one, I will execute it to the letter and in the spirit of 1863, under all hazards and to the end; not because it is a contract with banks, but because it is the nation's plighted word—a token to be redeemed when presented, though the heavens fall. It is for this reason that I am opposed to the amendment of my respected friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] as I understand its effect, and for the same reason shall at all times vote against any infringement of the chartered rights of these banks.

TWENTY YEARS' NOTICE REQUIRED TO BE GIVEN TO THE BANKS.

But, Mr. Chairman, the question as to whether we will observe existing contracts is wholly different from the question whether, after the expiration of a contract, we will again enter into a similar one? The first proposition is a matter of integrity; the second is a matter of business prudence, to be determined by our estimate of resultant advantages.

One significant feature of the existing contract is that which enables a new association to organize at any time, and guarantees its privileges for twenty years from that date. The first banks were formed in 1863, and will have to renew their charters before 1883, or dissolve. The charters taken in 1871 will run to 1891; and those taken in 1881 to 1901. So that if we maintain our faith with the banks, and equitably regard the rights which they have acquired under the law, it will be twenty years from to-day before these contracts can be finally closed; because, suppose this amendment were about to become law, would not those banks that wished to continue in business renew their charters before the approval of this bill, and would they not then have vested rights till the year 1901? Hence the real issue raised by this amendment is not whether we will now destroy the banks, nor whether we will now retire their notes; but whether we will now give the stipulated notice of twenty years, to the effect that after the year 1901 the national-bank system shall cease. This is the sole question, and is one to be solely decided by our interests as a nation.

FINANCIAL ADVANTAGE OF ABOLISHING THE BANKS IN 1901.

Let us see, first, what would be the effect of the amendment on the payment of the national debt.

The interest-bearing debt is as follows:

Six per cent. bonds irredeemable before 1881	$202,265,550
Five per cent. bonds irredeemable before 1881	469,651,050
Four and a half per cent. bonds irredeemable before 1891	250,000,000
Six per cent. Pacific Railway bonds irredeemable before 1901	97,678,808
Four per cent. bonds irredeemable before 1907	738,404,450
Total	1,757,999,858

We will assume that the five and six percents will be funded in three percents, and also that none of the banks organized prior to 1871 would withdraw their circulation until twenty years from that date.

In 1871 there were 1,767 banks, having a circulation of three hundred and seventeen millions. Under the amendment their notes would be retired in 1891 and the same amount of United States notes issued. With the proceeds thus obtained, we could pay off three hundred and seventeen millions of the interest-bearing debt, and in that year two hundred and fifty millions of the four and a half percents fall due. In 1881 there are 2,090 banks having a circulation of three hundred and forty-four millions which would be retired in 1901, when one hundred millions of the 6 per cent. Pacific Railroad bonds mature; while six years later the four percents of 1907, amounting to $738,000,000, are payable.

We have seen that the interest at 3½ per cent. on the bank-note circulation amounts to $12,000,000 a year. By substituting our own notes for the bank notes we would certainly save that amount of interest during ten years, or an aggregate sum of $120,000,000. Whether the advantages which the nation would derive during the decade from 1891 to 1901 by the continuance of the bank notes, rather than of United States notes, would prove to be worth $120,000,000, is a question that each gentleman can answer for himself. I would prefer to see that sum applied to the reduction of the debt. And so would every man, if this were the only effect of the amendment.

OUR FINANCIAL SYSTEM THE BEST WE HAVE EVER HAD.

But it is sincerely believed by many gentlemen on this floor that even so great a pecuniary benefit as this would be more than counterbalanced by a termination of the national banks. They affirm that neither this nor any other nation has ever had a safer, wiser, or better financial system than is ours to-day.

I heartily concur in the proposition. Any one at all familiar with the old days of State banks, of fluctuating paper, of "red-dog," "wild-cat," and "shin-plaster" notes, will fully concede the incomparable superiority of the present system; and if the only alternative be the one or the other of these two systems, most certainly the existing laws should remain unchanged. But that is not the only alternative. It does not follow that upon an abandonment of the present system we would return to the former one. The American people, like revolutions, never go backward. Neither does it follow that because the present system is the best we have ever had, it is therefore the best which we ever can have. Perhaps all of the wisdom may not die with us, and perhaps the next generation may make financial improvements quite as great as those which this generation has undoubtedly made.

What, now, are the elements which give to the present system its admitted superiority? They are, first, the presence of gold and silver coin in their proper places and performing their natural functions; second, the presence of a paper currency everywhere at par and always exchangeable for coin in any town on this continent; third, the security given to the national-bank note by the indorsement of Government, and the security given for this indorsement by the deposit of United States bonds. So that the real question is: What would be the effect of a substitution of United States notes for bank notes upon the practical workings of this financial system, or, to what extent is that system dependent upon the national banks for its excellence?

EFFECT OF SUBSTITUTING UNITED STATES NOTES FOR BANK NOTES.

It is certainly evident that so long as the quantity of paper remains what it now is, the proportion of this quantity issued by the Government or issued by the banks can have no effect whatever upon the supply of coin, and therefore none upon the workings of the present system. It is immaterial whether the whole volume be issued by the one party or by the other. The essential quality of a paper currency is not who issues it, nor, for that matter, what quantity is issued, but the certainty that it can be promptly exchanged for coin. When this certainty is assured, the question whether a bank or the United States makes the issue is of no practical importance; and therefore the withdrawal of bank notes and the equal issuance of United States notes could in no wise affect the excellence of our present financial system, so far as the quantity and quality of money are concerned.

Neither could this substitution of one for the other affect the working of the present system, so far as the willingness of the people to take paper instead of coin is concerned.

What security has the holder of a bank note for the fulfillment of its promise to pay money? None in the world, except the indorsement of the United States. The confidence of the holder rests chiefly upon the pledge of the Government, and precious little, if at all, upon that of the bank. He does not care a straw whether the bank is solvent or insolvent; the Government will make the promise good, and that is enough for him.

And so far as the Government is concerned, the only security possessed by it for its indorsement is the market value of its own promise. The bond which it holds, as the property of the bank, is simply a promise of the United States to pay dollars. A greenback is exactly the same—a promise of the United States to pay dollars. The one has no greater strength or availability than the other. Hence the exact difference between a bank note and a greenback is, that the former is the note of five men secured by the promise of the United States to pay it, if they do not, and a greenback is the direct promise of the United States to pay. And all men will admit that as the willingness of the people to take the bank note arises solely from their confidence in the promise of the Government, they would certainly be equally willing to take a United States note instead of a bank note. So that, in this regard, the present system would not be affected by the plan proposed in my amendment.

Hence, as neither the present volume of coin and currency, nor the willingness of the people to take a United States note, can by any possibility be affected, one way or another, by the substitution of United States notes for bank notes, the proposition certainly is proven that the excellence of our financial system does not depend upon the fact that banks, rather than the Government, issue our currency.

NEITHER THE GOVERNMENT NOR BANKS SHOULD HAVE POWER TO CONTROL THE VOLUME OF CURRENCY.

But it is alleged that the banking system gives to business men the power to increase or diminish the quantity of currency, upon the deposit or withdrawal of bonds as security. That is true. It is further claimed that this power over the elasticity of currency is an essential and valuable feature of the national banking system, and that the destruction of this elasticity would injuriously affect our whole financial system. I deny this proposition, and wish to discuss it fairly.

For many years after the enactment of the banking law this power was not exercised by the banks; because the maximum number of banks, the amount of notes which each might issue, and the total of circulation were rigidly limited. The volume of paper could be diminished, but not increased; so that this elasticity is neither an original nor an essential feature of the banking system.

I deny further that this power is a valuable or beneficial one to either the business world or the people, and affirm that the exercise of such a power should under no ordinary circumstances be committed to any State, corporation, or individual; should be exercised by the Government alone, when exercised at all; and by it only to the extent of providing the people with a more convenient money than coin. I utterly deny the expediency, as a general proposition, of any legalized power over the elasticity of the currency which is dependent for its exercise upon the whims or interests of any set of men, whether they be bank directors, Congressmen, political conventions, or stump orators; and affirm, on the other hand, that an eternal tinkering with the volume of currency always has been and always will be a usurpation of unwarranted power, and a curse to every man who has anything to sell or buy.

When the bank advocates denounce the measures of the greenback party in this direction I concur, and when the greenbackers denounce the action of the bank advocates in this respect I also concur. Each is right, in my judgment, as respects the other on this point. And when the bank orators portray the dangerous consequences that would follow from congressional action, the wonder instantly arises at their failure to perceive that this precise power over the elasticity of currency, which they so greatly deplore when exercised by politicians, is the very thing which they claim as the great excellence of our financial system when exercised by the banks. Perhaps, after all, it is not so much the "power" to which either of these parties is opposed, as it is to the fact that the other fellows are exercising that power instead of their fellows!

I concede the claim that if this power should be exercised by anybody, it is as safely guarded and as responsive to the demands of trade under the present banking system as it can be under any artificial system. The holders of the notes are secured by the promise of the Government; Government is secured by an ample deposit of marketable bonds. If there is a demand for more currency, the bank can make a profit by an additional issue, just as a smith can make a profit by supplying an increased demand for horse-shoes. If the supply of paper becomes greater than the demand, the bank, failing to make a profit, will reduce the supply of notes and invest its capital where a profit can be made. The system is one of checks and balances, guarded by that most powerful of forces, self-interest, and is measurably responsive to the fluctuations of supply and demand. It is frequently spoken of as being a self-acting "regulator" of the supply of money, in the same sense that a "governor" regulates the supply of steam to an engine.

THE TRUE FUNCTION OF MONEY.

Now, the fact is that money performs a wholly different function from that performed by steam. Steam drives the engine; money does not drive business, neither does it drive the machinery of exchanging products. So far from being the force which impels the exchange of articles, it is only as the wagon in which the balance remaining after an exchange has been made is delivered to the proper person. You may say that a wagon measures quantity; it does. But that is not the main use of a wagon, only an incident to its use. And so does money measure quantity, but that is only an incident; its main use is as a carrier of exchangeable value, chiefly of the balance remaining after an exchange of articles. In no sense is it the motor which drives the machinery of exchange; and therefore in no sense can it be true that the power of banks to regulate the supply of money is a "governor" or self-acting "regulator" of business.

Money is neither more nor less than a tool, by the use of which the exchange of commodities can be more accurately and quickly effected than if the commodities were exchanged in kind. Men use it for exactly the same reasons that they use a hammer for driving nails or a plow for turning the soil. And they make this tool out of gold and silver for the same reasons that iron is used for hammers and steel for knives, because the qualities of these respective metals best fit them for the particular tool.

MONEY NOT ESSENTIAL IN MAKING EXCHANGES.

But exchanges may be made without the use of coin, paper, or any other sort of lawful money. Labor may be directly exchanged for merchandise; wheat for city property; legal skill for medical skill. The greater part of exchanges is made by credits on account; by promissory notes; by checks and drafts. In one sense, and to a huge extent, these perform exactly the same office that coin does; and in that sense are a part of the money machinery of the country, just as truly as are currency and coin. And it is perfectly clear that in this sense the elasticity of currency is wholly independent, and beyond the control, of either banks or government. Any man who is willing or unwilling to trust another exercises to that extent a power over the elasticity of general currency. For every sale amounting to $100 in value, on the average less than ten dollars of lawful money is used. During the year 1880 the transactions of the New York clearing-house averaged $121,000,000 a day; and yet the amount of lawful money used in settling balances was less than five millions a day, or at the rate of $4 of money for each $100 of business.

THE TRUE ELASTICITY OF CURRENCY.

Here, then, you have an elasticity which is higher than statutes and broader than the reach of governments. It springs from the very nature of things, and roots itself in the individual judgments of men. It is not artificial. It is not exercised by any one class; it is exercised by every man who credits either the written or verbal promise of another man, and for this reason it acts instantaneously both as a record of, and in flashing response to, the demands of trade. It is older than governments and will outlast civil law, for it began when the first trade was made on the earth and will endure as long as one man desires that which another is willing to deliver. It was originally devised by the Creator, and moves with the precision of the stars under laws which He enacted. In my judgment this Congress cannot particularly improve upon the arrangement, and I doubt whether even the eminent financiers of this House can either prevent or expedite its action. I do not wish to be brash, but it strikes me as being quite as good as and a deal more certain than even the "elasticity" provided by the national-banking system.

But, of course, when we speak of money the "lawful" money of the land is intended, and the elasticity of the bank system applies to this "lawful" money. We have now thirteen hundred millions of it, about one half of which is paper. Is not that enough? Is there any good reason why banks should have unrestrained power to issue more? Are we not safer in depending upon the fixed laws of trade and upon this natural elasticity than upon an artificial one, which somehow suggests the idea of dame Partington sweeping back the ocean with a broom?

When all is said the value of paper depends on its payment in coin. If the coin is not in the country the paper will be worthless. Now is there anything in the banking system which insures the presence of coin? Certainly not. That is a result of exportation and importation. So long as we sell more to other nations than we buy from them the balance will be paid in coin. And just when we buy more than we sell we must pay our balance in coin.

Can the banks change these facts? All that they can do is to "relieve" the stringency of money, occasioned by the outflow of coin, by issuing more of their promises to pay coin. The greater the stringency, the greater their issues of promises, and of course the less relative amount of coin with which to pay them. Then what? Smash, all along the line! So far from preventing ruin, this "elasticity" intensifies it; and so far from being a valuable or beneficent feature of our system, it is a humbug and a fraud. It always has been so, and always will be so, whether controlled by associations or by a government.

The sooner this notion is eliminated from the minds of the people, and this power from our financial system, the better for all concerned. And the sooner the eastern wing of the republican party makes up its mind, that while as a nation we must keep our pledges, and as a party we must stand by the nation's contract with these banks, yet we cannot afford to put off forever the serving of notice that this legalized elasticity shall cease twenty years after such notification, the better it will be for the republican party as a whole. Defending the national faith, and maintaining the national honor so long as it is pledged, even were it to the devil, is one thing; but defending the proposition that we will, year by year, put the possibility of terminating the pledge still twenty years further beyond our reach, is a wholly different thing. I stand squarely toward both of these propositions, and, while supporting the first, oppose the last.

Long before 1901 this American nation, with its fertile soil, numberless fields, bright workmen, and wonderful machineries, will have reached the point where its productions will so greatly exceed its importations that the balance of trade will inevitably and permanently keep the surplus coin of the world in our coffers. And then certificates of coin deposited in the national Treasury will be even a safer paper than the promise of the United States to pay coin, and I had almost said even a safer paper than a promise of the United States to pay a promise of a national bank in the event that the bank should not. But I will not presume to say that on the spur of the moment—that is a thing to be carefully considered before it is said!

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. J. R. CHALMERS,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt, as amended.

Mr. CHALMERS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: A few days since I announced that I was opposed to the funding bill then and that I should vote against any proposition then pending to refund for the reasons then given; but so many of my objections have been removed by the bill as now amended that I shall vote for it. The option of the Government to pay the debt is retained and the danger of its perpetuation therefore removed. The new bonds and certificates are to be issued upon precisely the same terms as the bonds now outstanding and the right to pay in silver thereby preserved. Again, full provision is made for the use of the surplus coin in the Treasury in payment of the bonded debt, though this is not made as mandatory as I would have preferred it to be; and this I regard as a very important step in the right direction. But the new feature of the bill introduced by what is known as Mr. CARLISLE'S amendment is the one that commends it most to my approval.

Under the law as it now stands the national banks could, by a combination, withdraw all their bonds, almost in a day, by placing the same amount of greenbacks in the Treasury, and thus not only fearfully contract the currency but leave the United States Government alone responsible for the national-bank circulation. It puts a stop also to the constant speculation that has been going on by the national banks in the bonds which they pretended to have deposited for the security of their circulation. When bonds went up they deposited greenbacks and drew out their bonds for sale. When bonds went down they deposited new bonds and drew a new issue of national-bank circulation. Thus they have not only speculated in bonds, but while denouncing all attempts to increase the circulation by Treasury notes they have been increasing the number of national-bank notes. The Treasurer's report shows that by this operation one bank had nearly double the amount of its notes in circulation that it was entitled to have by the original law. And with the law as it now stands it is clear that the national banks, which were created to assist the Government in disposing of its bonds, can defeat any scheme of refunding that does not suit them and dictate their own terms to the Government. The effect and importance of this amendment has been well described, by a leading New York paper, as follows:

> The most important change made in the bill is the adoption of Mr. CARLISLE'S substitute for its fifth section. Without Mr. CARLISLE'S amendment it would have led to such a violent contraction of the currency as would have convulsed business and have brought swift ruin on many interests. The main lever for forcing a sale of the new bonds is a requirement that they alone shall be receivable as deposits for securing the circulation of the national banks. Without Mr. CARLISLE'S amendment this purpose could easily be defeated by the banks by a withdrawal of their circulation. The act of 1874, which Mr. CARLISLE'S substitute repeals, affords them facilities for the prompt and speedy retirement of their circulation in a way which might cause a disastrous contraction of the currency. They have only to deposit with the Treasurer an amount of legal-tender notes equal to their circulation to be entitled to withdraw the bonds pledged for it, which they would be under a strong temptation to do in order to realize the premium on the present bonds. The new funding bill aims to forestall such action by repealing the fourth section of the act of 1874 and compelling the banks actually to redeem their circulation before they can recover the bonds deposited to secure it. Redemption of the bank notes by this method would necessarily be a slow process, which would prevent both a violent contraction of the currency and a sudden withdrawal of the deposited bonds.

Mr. CARLISLE'S substitute makes another great change. It re-enacts certain sections of the Revised Statutes which require all national banks to keep on deposit with the Treasurer an amount of Government bonds equal to one-third of their capital, whether they issue any circulating notes or not. By the law as it now stands they can withdraw nearly all their bonds by simply retiring their circulation.

Under the new bill they cannot do business at all without a large amount of bonds kept on deposit with the Government. The bill also requires that only the new bonds shall be received as security of the public money deposited with the national banks. In virtue of these provisions it may be possible to create an artificial market for 3 per cent. bonds.

From this it will be seen that this is an amendment which must commend itself to all who do not desire to see the Government controlled by the banks. What Mr. Calhoun said of the war of General Jackson against the United States Bank is true to-day:

That extraordinary man, who had the power of imprinting his own feelings on the community, then commenced his hostile attacks, which have left such effects behind that the war then commenced against the banks, I clearly see, will not terminate unless there be a separation between them and the Government, until one or the other triumphs, till the Government becomes the bank or the banks the Government.

To produce this separation I introduced my amendment. As I had not opportunity fully to explain the amendment offered by me in the brief time allowed under the five-minute rule, I take advantage of the leave granted by the House to explain it at greater length, and I propose especially to show that this amendment contains the old doctrine of the democratic party.

Thomas Jefferson advocated the issuance of Treasury notes by the United States Government.

Mr. Calhoun, who was the greatest leader of Southern democratic thought, said:

It is, then, my impression that in the present condition of the world a paper currency, in some form, if not necessary, is almost indispensable in financial and commercial operations of civilized and extensive communities.—Calhoun's Works, 3d volume, page 83.

Mr. Hunter, when the democratic chairman of the Finance Committee in the Senate, said:

Perhaps no discovery in the whole machinery of commerce has been more important to the world than that of the bills of exchange.—Senate Report, first session Thirty-second Congress, page 104.

General Jackson overthrew the United States Bank, but recognizing the necessity for some kind of paper currency formed a league with State banks that was called the "pet-bank system."

When this system failed, the democratic party under Mr. Polk passed the law of 1846, declaring that nothing should be received into the Treasury of the United States as money except gold, silver, and Treasury notes, and that was the law when the last democratic administration closed under Mr. Buchanan.

It is scarcely necessary to cite authority to show that the democratic party has always opposed a union of the Government with banks, but it may be necessary to show what many seem not to understand, that the national banks of to-day are the fiscal agents of the United States, and that the notes of the national banks are by law made a legal tender for every debt except between individuals.

The United States is compelled by law to receive them for everything except customs dues, and every man to whom the Government is indebted is bound also to take these notes, which are but the debts of corporations, as legal-tender money. The Government may to-morrow buy a thousand horses from its citizens to mount its cavalry, and they would be compelled to receive national-bank notes as payment whether they wish to or not.

After providing for the issuance of these bank notes, the law says:

And the same shall be received at par in all parts of the United States in payment of taxes, excises, public lands, and all other dues to the United States except duties on imports; and also for all salaries and other debts and demands owing by the United States to individuals, corporations, and associations within the United States, except interest on the public debt and in redemption of the national currency.—Revised Statues United States, section 5182.

And yet the republican party, which denies to the Government the constitutional power to give a legal-tender quality to greenbacks in time of peace, maintains the constitutional power of the Government to give this legal-tender quality to these notes which are but the debt of private bank corporations. And a republican administration, indorsed, I regret to say, by some few democrats, have proposed to take from greenbacks their legal-tender quality and leave the national-bank notes with their full legal-tender quality as to everything except debt between individuals. As a strict-construction democrat, I believed the original issuance of legal-tender paper money unconstitutional, just as I believed the war itself unconstitutional to coerce a State. But those who believe a war of coercion against a State constitutional cannot logically deny the constitutionality of legal-tender greenbacks. And those who acquiesce in the results of the war should not seek to disturb the greenbacks, which have proved the most beneficial of all those results.

But the advocates of national banks claim that the issuance of legal-tender greenbacks was the exercise of a war power, and that while constitutional in time of war it is unconstitutional in time of peace, and that the Supreme Court of the United States so held in the case of Knox vs. Lee, 12 Wallace.

This is not true. The logic of that decision, stripped of its verbiage, is this: the Government has power to preserve its own life, and this gave the power to make war against States claimed to be in rebellion. The Government has power to borrow money, and if its existence depends on obtaining the money necessary to its existence, and no one is willing or able to lend this money thus to preserve its life, it has power to force a loan from its citizens by the issuance of legal-tender paper.

But the Supreme Court decided in the Mulligan case that there could be no such thing as a constitutional power in war which did not exist in time of peace. There are, of course, emergencies in war which do not arise in time of peace, which would induce Congress to exercise a power in war which it would not exert in peace. But at last, when a power is admitted to exist, it is left entirely to the law-making power to say when that power shall be exercised. The seceding States were conquered and coerced in war, and when the war was over they were forcibly reconstructed in peace. Emancipation was proclaimed in war and forcibly accomplished in peace. So greenbacks were issued in war, and their circulation, by their legal-tender quality, forcibly maintained in peace. The injustice of their issuance was upon those who had contracted debts expecting payment in coin, and the withdrawal now of their legal-tender quality would work injustice to those who have contracted debts expecting to be able to pay in greenbacks. I am opposed, therefore, to any interference with the greenback now in circulation. Again, while I am not disposed to question now the constitutional power of this Government in an emergency to issue further legal-tender paper, I do not believe that emergency exists at this time. And further, I recognize the fact that a further issue of legal-tender paper might inflate prices, and I agree to the fullest extent that the constant exercise of this great power by Congress would be dangerous to the business interests of the country and tend to further centralization of Federal authority.

I know that a great change has already come over the public spirit of the United States; and I fear that what General Garfield said in the last canvass is only too true: "The ideas of Thomas Jefferson are losing and the ideas of Alexander Hamilton are growing in popular favor." The youth of the country and the rapidly increasing foreign population are all taught to believe that State rights and slavery, strict construction and rebellion, are synonymous terms. The freedom of the individual is lost sight of in the splendor of a nation, and local liberty is sacrificed if it conflicts with the demands of national power. While the Queen of Great Britain must give up a favorite minister and appoint another distasteful to herself in obedience to the will of the House of Commons, American Presidents are growing so fast in power that they bid defiance to both branches of Congress. For this reason I am opposed to any further issuance of legal-tender money at this time, and I am equally opposed to a continuance of the national-bank system.

But some kind of paper money is essential to commerce. What, then, shall this currency be? Let that question be answered by John C. Calhoun. No intellect was more able to penetrate truth, no hand more ready to strike in defense of the Constitution, and no heart more true to his people than his; and where he leads any democrat may well follow without fear of infringing the Constitution or strengthening centralized power. He says:

On what, then, ought a paper currency to rest? I would say on demand and supply simply, which regulate the value of everything else, the constant demand which the Government has on the community for its necessary supplies. A medium resting on this demand which simply obligates the Government to receive it in all of its dues, to the exclusion of everything else except gold and silver, and which shall be optional with those who have demands on the Government to receive or not, would, it seems to me, be as stable in its value as these metals themselves, and be as little liable to abuse as the power of coining. It would contain within itself a self-regulating power. It could only be issued to those who had claims on the Government, and to those only with their consent.

Believing this to be the true financial theory to be adopted by our Government, I offered the following amendment as a separate section to the bill, and if it had been adopted I believe our bonded debt could have been paid without any refunding, and that national-bank notes would have been easily and gradually retired and their place supplied by the best currency we could possibly have:

SEC. 6. That from and after the passage of this act, all notes of national banks which may be received by the Treasury Department, or by any officer thereof, shall be retained and forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington, who shall retain the same, and shall not pay them out again for any purpose whatever; but shall assort them, and whenever the notes of any one bank shall be received to the amount of $1,000, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to immediately notify the officers of such bank and require them to come forward and witness, if they see fit, the destruction of said notes, and thereupon the bonds of the United States pledged for the redemption of said notes, to an amount equal, after computing the interest thereon, to the said national-bank notes so held, and the notes so held shall be immediately canceled and destroyed by the Secretary, in accordance with the provision of existing laws.

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever the notes of any national bank to the amount of $1,000 or more shall be canceled and destroyed under the provisions of this act, to cause to be printed and made ready for use an amount of Treasury notes, under the form provided in the law of 1862 and subsequent acts authorizing the issue of Treasury notes, exactly equal to the amount of national-bank notes so canceled and destroyed; which said Treasury notes shall be issued and paid out, to all persons willing to receive the same, for any and all demands against the Government of the United States, as fast as may be by law authorized and permitted, and when so issued they shall not be held and esteemed a legal tender.

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase, without limit, all silver bullion, trade-dollars, and foreign silver coins that may be offered for sale at the market value of silver, and such purchases shall be continued as long as 412½ grains of standard silver can be purchased for one dollar of Treasury notes. All such purchases shall be paid for with this new issue of Treasury notes. And all holders of any of the silver coins of the United States may present the same in any sum not less than $20 and receive therefor Treasury notes at par for the same. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have the silver bullion, trade-dollars, and foreign silver pieces coined as fast as possible into American silver coins and to apply all silver coins of the United States that may come into the Treasury to the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt.

I did not press this amendment more, because many who were willing to support it as a separate measure were unwilling to place it as an amendment to this funding bill. But the time is coming and will soon be here when national banks will be applying for new charters, and then this question must come up again.

The great questions which are now troubling the minds of men, and upon which parties will soon be compelled to divide, are:

1. Shall we have a silver or a gold standard of value?

2. Shall the paper money of the country be furnished by the United States Government or by national banks?

Upon the first question I do not care to say more than I have. I do not think any sane man will say the old democratic fathers did not favor the silver dollar of 412½ grains.

But men in high places have asserted that in order to return to the old democratic faith we must advocate coinage by the Government of metallic money alone, and we must look to bank corporations for paper money necessary for the business of the country. The best way to settle this question is to turn to the record and see what the democratic fathers have said and practiced.

Mr. Gallatin was Secretary of the Treasury from 1801 to 1813. He declared that Treasury notes were as good as coin, and appealed to Congress for power to issue them in small denominations. (See his reports, volume 1, pages 469–489 and 503.) Mr. Campbell succeeded Mr. Gallatin in the Treasury, and, in accordance with recommendations from him and Mr. Jefferson, $25,000,000 in Treasury notes were issued in 1813.

Mr. Jefferson was clear and emphatic in his declarations as to the power and duty of the Government to issue Treasury notes, and equally emphatic against what he called "the useless, usurious, and demoralizing practices of bank directors and their accomplices," and we call special attention to this declaration of his. "Bank paper must be suppressed and the circulating medium must be restored to the Government, where it belongs. It is the only fund on which they can rely for loans; it is the only recourse which can never fail them, and it is an abundant one for every purpose." But I give his opinions at length on this subject, (Jefferson's Works, volume 4, pages 40 and 41:)

And so the nation may continue to issue its bills as far as its wants require and the limits of the circulation will admit. Those limits are understood to extend with us at present to two hundred millions of dollars, a greater sum than would be necessary for any war. But this, the only resource which the Government could command with certainty, the States have unfortunately fooled away, nay, corruptly alienated to swindlers and shavers, under the cover of private banks. Say, too, as an additional evil, that the disposal funds of individuals to this great amount have thus been withdrawn from improvement and useful enterprise, and employed in the useless, usurious, and demoralizing practices of bank directors and their accomplices. In the war of 1755 our State availed itself of this fund by issuing a paper money bottomed on a specific tax for its redemption, and to insure its credit, bearing an interest of 5 per cent. Within a very short time not a bill of this emission was to be found in circulation. It was locked up in the chests of executors, guardians, widows, farmers, &c. We then issued bills bottomed on a redeeming tax, but bearing no interest. These were readily received and never depreciated a single farthing. In the revolutionary war the old Congress and the States issued bills without interest and without tax. They occupied the channels of circulation very freely till those channels were overflowed by an excess beyond all the calls of circulation. But although we have so improvidently suffered the field of circulating medium to be filched from us by private individuals, yet I think we may recover it in part, and even in the whole, if the States will co-operate with us.

If Treasury bills are emitted on a tax appropriated for their redemption in fifteen years, and (to insure preference in the first moments of competition) bearing an interest of 6 per cent., there is no one who would not take them in preference to the bank paper now afloat, on a principle of patriotism as well as interest; and they would be withdrawn from circulation into private hoards to a considerable amount. Their credit once established, others might be omitted, bottomed also on a tax, but not bearing interest; and if ever their credit faltered, open public loans, on which these bills alone should be received as specie. These, operating as a sinking fund, would reduce the quantity in circulation, so as to maintain that in an equilibrium with specie. It is not easy to estimate the obstacles which, in the beginning, we should encounter in ousting the banks from their possession of the circulation; but a steady and judicious alteration of emissions and loans would reduce them in time. But while this is going on, another measure should be pressed to recover ultimately our right to the circulation. The States should be applied to to transfer the right of issuing circulating paper to Congress exclusively, in perpetuum, if possible, but during the war at least, with a saving of charter rights. I believe that every State west and south of Connecticut River, except Delaware, would immediately do it, and the others would follow in time. Congress would, of course, begin by obliging unchartered banks to wind up their affairs within a short time, and the others as their charters expired, forbidding the subsequent circulation of their paper. This they would supply with their own, bottomed, every emission on an adequate tax, and bearing or not bearing interest, as the state of the public pulse may indicate. Even in the non-complying States, these bills would make their way, and supplant the unfounded paper of their banks by their solidity, by the universality of their currency, and by their receivability for customs and taxes. It would be in their power, too, to curtail those banks to the amount of their actual specie, by gathering up their paper and running it constantly on them. The national paper might thus take place even in the non-complying States. In this war, I am not without a hope that this great, this sole resource for loans in an agricultural country, might yet be recovered for the use of the nation during the war; and if obtained in perpetuum, it would always be sufficient to carry us through any war.—Jefferson's Works, volume 6, pages 40 and 41.

The question will be asked, and ought to be looked at, what is to be the recourse if loans cannot be obtained? There is but one—"Carthago delenda est." Bank paper must be suppressed, and the circulating medium must be restored to the nation, to whom it belongs. It is the only fund on which they can rely for loans; it is the only recourse which can never fail them, and it is an abundant one for every necessary purpose. Treasury bills, bottomed on taxes, bearing or not bearing interest, as may be found necessary, thrown into circulation will take the place of so much gold and silver, which last, when crowded, will find an efflux into other countries, and thus keep the quantum of medium at its salutary level. Let banks continue, if they please, but let them discount for cash alone or for Treasury notes.

By comparing the first and the last of these articles, we see that if the United States were in possession of the circulating medium, as they ought to be, they could redeem what they could borrow from that, dollar for dollar, and in ten annual installments; whereas the usurpation of that fund by bank paper, obliging them to borrow elsewhere at 7½ per cent., $2 are required to reimburse $1. So that it is literally true that the toleration of banks of paper discount costs the United States one-half their war taxes; or, in other words, doubles the expenses of every war. Now think, but for a moment, what a change of condition that would be, which should save half our war expenses, require but half the taxes, and enthrall us in debt but half the time.—Ibid., page 201.

But we were in the midst of war, and the New England bankers—the fathers of the same money power in the East which refused in the late war to take Treasury notes until they were made legal-tenders, and which now seeks to substitute bank-notes for greenbacks—refused to receive the Treasury notes at par, and the United States Bank was chartered, against the advice of both Jefferson and Madison.

Mr. Madison has been called the father of the Constitution, and next to Mr. Jefferson was certainly the father of the democratic party. He was in favor of issuing Treasury notes for circulation, and vetoed the first bank bills passed during his administration because it tended to withdraw Treasury notes from circulation.

Mr. Jefferson had said "bank paper must be suppressed," but he foresaw the difficulty of it when he said, "It is not easy to estimate the obstacles which in the beginning we should encounter in ousting the banks from their possession of the circulation." General Jackson felt the full force of these difficulties, and after a desperate struggle, succeeded in doing what this great leader said should be done. But the descendants of Jefferson and Jackson are now called on to meet the hydra-headed monster of bank circulation again, and we must meet it as they did.

The importance of the principle involved in the inquiry whether it will be proper to recharter the Bank of the United States, requires that I should again call the attention of Congress to the subject. Nothing has occurred to lessen in any degree the danger which many of our citizens apprehend from that institution as at present organized. In the spirit of improvement and compromise which distinguished our country and its institutions it becomes us to inquire whether it be not possible to secure the advantages afforded by the present bank, through the agency of a bank of the United States so modified in its principles and structure as to obviate constitutional and other objections.

It is thought practicable to organize such bank, with the necessary officers, as a branch of the Treasury Department, based on the public and individual deposits, without power to make loans or purchase property, which shall remit the funds of the Government, and the expenses of which may be paid, if thought advisable, by allowing its officers to sell bills of exchange to private individuals at a moderate premium. Not being a corporate body, having no stockholders, debtors, or property, and but few officers, it would not be obnoxious to the constitutional objections which are urged against the present bank: and having no means to operate on the hopes, fears, or interests of large masses of the community, it would be shorn of the influence which makes that bank so formidable.—Message of Andrew Jackson, December 7, 1830, (Statesman's Manual, volume 2, page 753.)

OPINIONS OF JOHN C. CALHOUN.

But it was left for Mr. Calhoun, the clearest intellect our country has ever produced, to exhaust the argument on this, as on every other subject he touched. Rejecting the idea of what is called "fiat money," he required "that it be left perfectly free to those who have claims on the Government to receive it or not."

I quote from the speech of Mr. Calhoun in the Senate of the United States, in October, 1837, as follows:

It is, then, my impression that in the present condition of the world a paper currency in some form * * * is almost indispensable in financial and commercial operations of civilized and extensive communities. In many respects it has a vast superiority over a metallic currency, especially in great and extended transactions, by its greater cheapness, lightness, and the facility of determining the amount.

It may throw some light on this subject to state that North Carolina, just after the Revolution, issued a large amount of paper, which was made receivable in dues to her; it was also made a legal tender, but which, of course, was not made obligatory after the adoption of the Federal Constitution. A large amount—say between four and five hundred thousand dollars—remained in circulation after that period, and continued to circulate for more than twenty years at par with gold and silver during the whole time, with no other advantage than being received in the revenue of the State, which was much less than $100,000 per annum.

No one can doubt but that the Government credit is better than that of any bank—more reliable, more safe. Why, then, should it mix it up with the less perfect credit of those institutions? Why not use its own credit to the amount of its own transactions? Why should it not be safe in its own hands while it shall be considered safe in the hands of eight hundred private institutions scattered all over the country, and which have no other object but their own private profit? to increase which they extend their business to the most dangerous extremes. And why should the community be compelled to give 6 per cent. discount for the Government credit, blended with that of the bank, when the superior credit of the Government could be furnished separately without discount, to the mutual advantage of the Government and the community?

But whatever may be the amount that can be circulated, I hold it clear that to that amount it would be as stable in value as gold and silver itself, provided the Government be bound to receive it exclusively with those metals in all its dues and that it be left perfectly optional with those who have claims on the Government to receive it or not.—Appendix to Congressional Globe, first session, Twenty-fifth Congress, page 36, 1837.

Again I quote from Mr. Calhoun:

We are told the form I suggested is but a repetition of the "old continental money;" a ghost that is ever conjured up by all who wish to give the banks an exclusive monopoly of Government credit. The assertion is not true; there is not the least analogy between them. The one is a promise to pay when there is no revenue, and the other a promise to receive in the dues of the Government when there is abundant revenue.

We are told that there is no instance of a government paper that did not depreciate. In reply, I affirm that there is none, assuming the form I propose, that ever did depreciate. Whenever a paper, receivable in dues of Government, had anything like a fair trial, it has succeeded. Instance the case of North Carolina, referred to in my opening remarks. The drafts of the Treasury at this moment, with all their incumbrance, are nearly at par with gold and silver. * * * The case of Russia might also be mentioned. In 1827 she had a fixed paper circulation in the form of bank notes, but which were inconvertible, of upward of one hundred and twenty million dollars, estimated in the metallic ruble, and which had for years remained, without fluctuation, having nothing to sustain it but that it was received in dues of the government, and that, too, with a revenue of only about ninety million dollars annually. I speak on the authority of a respectable traveler. Other instances no doubt might be added, but it needs no such support.

It has another and striking advantage over bank circulation in its superior cheapness as well as greater stability and safety. Bank paper is cheap to those who make it, but dear, very dear, to those who use it—fully as much as gold and silver. It is the little cost of its manufacture and the dear rates at which it is furnished to the community which gives the great profit to those who have a monopoly of the article. Some idea may be formed of the extent of the profit by the splendid palaces which we see under the name of banking-houses and the vast fortunes which have been accumulated in this branch of business, all of which must ultimately be derived from the productive powers of the community, and of course adds so much to the cost of production. On the other hand, the credit of Government, while it would greatly facilitate its financial operations, would cost nothing, or next to nothing, both to it and to the people, and of course would add nothing to the cost of production, which would give to every branch of industry, agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, as far as circulation might extend, great advantage both at home and abroad.

Quotation from Mr. Calhoun, in 1838:

I now undertake to affirm positively, and without the least fear that I can be answered, what heretofore I have but suggested—that a paper issued by Government, with the simple promise to receive in all dues, leaving its creditors to take it or gold and silver, at their option, would, to the extent to which it would circulate, form a perfect paper circulation, which could not be abused by the Government, that would be as steady and uniform in value as the metals themselves. I shall not go into the discussion now, but on a suitable occasion I shall be able to make good every word I have uttered. I will be able to do more—to prove that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to use such a paper in the management of its finances according to the most rigid rule of construing the Constitution; and those at least who think that Congress can authorize the notes of private corporations to be received in the public dues are estopped from denying its right to receive its own paper.

Let those who talk about returning to the old democratic doctrine study what the democratic fathers taught. As Mr. Calhoun says, "Paper currency is indispensable in commercial transactions," and the simple question now is, who shall furnish that paper money? No prudent man desires to return to the system of wild-cat banks. The paper money must be national in character, and it must be issued either by the Government itself or by national banks.

OPINION OF T. H. BENTON.

To show that no democrat can advocate its issuance by national banks I cite the following from Thomas H. Benton, who was for thirty years a leader in the democratic party:

The Government ought not to delegate this power if it could. It was too great a power to be trusted to any banking company whatever, or to any authority but the highest and most responsible which was known to our form of government.

The Government itself ceases to be independent, it ceases to be safe, when the national currency is at the will of a company. The Government can undertake no great enterprise, neither of war nor peace, without the consent and co-operation of that company; it cannot count its revenues for six months ahead without referring to the action of that company—its friendship or its enmity, its concurrence or opposition—to see how far that company will permit money to be scarce or to be plenty; how far it will let the money system go on regularly or throw it into disorder; how far it will suit the interest or policy of that company to create a tempest or suffer a calm in the moneyed ocean. The people are not safe when such a company has such a power. The temptation is too great, the opportunity too easy, to put up and put down prices; to make and break fortunes; to bring the whole community upon its knees to the Neptunes who preside over the flux and reflux of paper. All property is at their mercy. The price of real estate, of every growing crop, of every staple article in the market, is at their command. Stocks are their playthings, their gambling theater, on which they gamble daily with as little secrecy and as little morality, and far more mischief to fortunes, than common gamblers carry on their operations.

These were the doctrines of our democratic fathers, and the sooner we return to them the better for us. Banks, fundmongers, and corporations have no sympathy with the democracy, and when their managers profess to be democratic it is but to control that party for their own interest. The principles of democracy are imbedded in the hearts of the people, and the sooner we learn to fight for principle without regard to success the sooner we will succeed and the more lasting our victory will be. When we fought boldly under what is now ridiculed as "the Ohio idea" we won State after State and filled both Houses of Congress with democrats from the North and the South. When we changed to the eastern platform at Saint Louis in 1876 we began to lose members of Congress and continued to lose until we are now once more in a minority. I have no objection to forming alliances against the republican party, either with Wall-street bankers or national greenbackers or Pennsylvania protectionists, but we should receive them simply as allies and not the controlling leaders of our own party. The tories united with O'Connell to defeat the whigs; Beaconsfield or Gladstone would either unite to-day with the Irish home-rulers to defeat the other; the republicans united with the greenbackers in Tennessee, Alabama, Texas, and Missouri to defeat the democrats, but none of these great parties surrendered any principle in so doing.

The English, the Scotch, and the French laid aside their feuds in defense of the holy sepulcher, and such combinations show practical wisdom either in politics or war.

It is idle for us to denounce the greenbackers of Missouri as republicans in disguise, when we know a democrat represents Indiana in the Senate by the aid of greenback votes. If we had been governed more by common sense and less by passion and sentiment we would have preserved our combination made in Indiana in 1878, and to-day Hancock would be the President-elect of the United States.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. BENTON McMILLIN,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 12, 1881.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt—

Mr. McMILLIN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: In the limited time allowed for the discussion of this bill, I shall be unable to consider it in all of its bearings and to discuss the financial questions which are necessarily interwoven with it as fully as I should like; but will ask the attention of the House briefly upon some of the most important points. We have an immense interest-bearing public debt hanging over us, amounting in the aggregate to $1,675,265,400. A large portion of it becomes payable or redeemable on or before July 1, 1881, as follows:

Title of loan.	Rate.	Payable.	Redeemable.	Amount.
Loan of February, 1861	6 per cent.	Dec. 31, 1880	.....	$13, 414, 000
Oregon-war debt	6 per cent.	July 1, 1881	.....	711, 800
Loan July and Aug., 1861	6 per cent.	.....	June 30, 1881	145, 786, 500
Loan of 1863, (1881's)	6 per cent.	.....	June 30, 1881	57, 787, 250
Funded loan of 1881	5 per cent.	.....	May 1, 1881	469, 651, 050
Outstanding Nov. 1, 1880.	.....	.....	.....	687, 350, 600

According to the contract under which these bonds were issued, the Government may pay them off this year, but is not compelled to do so. The proposition before the House is to issue new bonds bearing a lower rate of interest, and with that raise the money necessary to redeem the outstanding bonds. It is practically to reduce the rate of interest. If we can have some amendments made to the bill reported by the committee I shall support it, but will not in its present shape.

We have now reached a point where we have to determine whether we will pay the debt as fast as possible or perpetuate it. I am heartily in favor of paying it as rapidly as we can consistently with reasonable taxation. In the course of my remarks I shall discuss the means of paying it. The governments of the Old World, weighted down with debts which have been accumulating for centuries, stand out and admonish us to extinguish ours. England's debt began in 1688, and has come down with the generations accumulating like the avalanche with the descent. That debt-oppressed people pay three or four times as much as the principal of their debt in interest each century, and yet the principal stands against them. Germany and Russia both pay about twice as much to carry on their governments and pay their interest accounts as they did in 1865. Spain, Turkey, in fact all of the old countries, may be said to be in the same deplorable condition.

I am unalterably opposed to any scheme which tends to make our debt permanent. I can conceive of no legislation more pernicious than that which would make this burden everlasting. A tender to us by our creditors of low interest or longer indulgence should not make us so far forget the best interest of our country as to refund the debt in long-time bonds, and thereby give up our right to be free from debt any day we have the money to pay out. I do not propose while my constituents honor me with a seat here to vote for any bill refunding in bonds which the Government cannot call in less than fifty, forty, thirty, twenty, or even ten years. If we can issue Treasury notes or short-term bonds bearing a lower rate of interest, say 3 per cent., instead of the six percents, and at the same time not hamper the Government in its exercise of the right to pay, I have no objection. We will thereby save by reduction of interest $12,000,000 per annum without sacrificing our control of the debt. My preference would be a Treasury note which could be paid off at the end of one year; but doubts are entertained as to whether they can be floated to the full extent of the debt falling due in July. If not we may be forced to give a little longer time on part of it, but whatever comes we should not give up control of the debt.

The former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Chase, showed his financial wisdom so far back as 1863 by admonishing Congress to keep control of our national debt by making the bonds redeemable after a short term instead of a long one, in the following language:

The object of future controllability has also had a prominent place in the regards of the Secretary. Under the conditions which existed at the outbreak of the rebellion he acquiesced in the necessity which seemed to dictate the negotiation of bonds payable after twenty years; but he acquiesced with reluctance, and as soon as permitted by circumstances recommended the enactment of laws authorizing the issue of bonds payable after shorter periods as well as the creation of temporary debt in other forms. In harmony with these views, Congress provided for the issue of the bonds known as the five-twenties, and also for the issue of Treasury notes payable three years from date; for certificates of indebtedness payable in one year, and for temporary loans by deposits reimbursable after ten days' notice. At the last session Congress repealed some embarrassing restrictions of former acts, and authorized the issue of bonds payable after ten years, and of Treasury notes payable at pleasure or three years from date. These Treasury notes were made legal-tenders for face value or convertible, for amount and interest, into United States notes.

The Secretary availed himself of this legislation by placing with the people as large an amount as possible of 5-20 bonds and by using the other powers so as to put the whole debt, except the long loans first negotiated, in such a shape that prompt advantage can be taken of favorable circumstances to diminish the burdens it imposes on industry. Whenever the constitutional supremacy of the nation shall be re-established over all its parts it will be completely within the power of Congress and the Secretary to fund the whole or any part of the temporary debt in bonds bearing a very moderate interest and redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after very brief periods or perhaps at any time after their issue. Nothing further seems desirable on the score of controllability.

Mr. Chairman, I will give my reasons for holding that long-term bonds are not necessary and that we should not under any circumstances issue them: of the $687,350,600 of bonds falling due this year, the Secretary of the Treasury informs us he will be able to pay $50,000,000 out of the revenues of the year, leaving only $637,350,600 to be provided for. He also estimates the surplus revenues for 1881–1882 at more than ninety million dollars per annum. We may presume that with the rapid increase of our population and wealth there will be a corresponding increase of the revenues. What is to prevent us from discharging this portion of the debt within the next ten years? If we economize in expenditures and continue to receive the large surplus flowing into the Treasury we can pay it within that time. There is now lying idle in the Treasury in coin for the purpose of resumption, as shown by the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, $141,597,013.61.

I do not desire to molest resumption. We had much difficulty in arriving at it, and would have again were we to depart from it. But I favor keeping on hand no more specie than is necessary to maintain it. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] has signified his intention to offer at the proper time an amendment to this bill requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out all the specie held for redemption of greenbacks except $50,000,000 on bonds falling due. I favor that amendment and hope some such principle will be ingrafted into this bill. My opinion is that we can use $100,000,000 of our coin without endangering resumption in the least. It is presumed that there was as much currency presented for redemption in coin last year as will be in succeeding years.

On page 13 of the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury he tells us that the amount of notes presented for redemption for one year prior to November 1, 1880, was $706,658. To meet and redeem this amount we keep locked up in the Treasury vaults more than $141,000,000. The surplus—say $100,000,000—above the amount necessary for redemption is represented by outstanding bonds, upon which we pay four and one-half millions of interest yearly, and we will pay more than $100,000,000 in interest thereon between now and 1907, when the bonds fall due. By paying off the bonds with the specie this will all be saved. One hundred million dollars more of coin will thereby be added to the circulation, inflating the currency to that extent, and will go forth to enliven trade, move commerce, and carry joy to a tax-ridden and debt-burdened people by furnishing them the means with which to meet their obligations. The very fact of scattering so large an amount of coin among the people will tend to supply their gold and silver demands and prevent them from having to go to the Treasury for coin. As shedding light upon the question how much gold should be hoarded to maintain resumption of specie payments I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a statement contained in the last report made by the Treasurer.

The Clerk read as follows:

The amount of gold coin and bullion in the Treasury January 1, 1879, the date of resumption of specie payments, was $135,382,639.42, and at this date it is $140,952,637.74, a gain of $5,570,198.32; and, in addition, there have accumulated in the Treasury $47,084,459 in standard silver dollars.

The redemption of United States notes in gold since the resumption of specie payments have aggregated $11,963,336, as follows:

	1879.	1880.
January	$1,571,725	$71,500
February	909,249	72,080
March	952,766	43,020
April	699,773	16,000
May	1,339,883	51,000
June	2,503,302	47,200
July	954,800	25,000
August	981,400	22,000
September	603,485	150,000
October	740,295	9,000
November	77,499	.....
December	122,359	.....

Mr. McMILLIN. From this, Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that resumption has added to instead of diminishing the amount of coin in the Treasury; that less than $12,000,000 of specie has been used in the two years of specie payments and that more than eleven-twelfths of that called for was demanded the first year. Another thing which must be taken into consideration is the fact stated by the Secretary of the Treasury on page 13 of his report, that:

Gold coin now enters largely into general circulation. Of the revenue from customs collected in New York for one year ending November 1, 1880, .57,475 per cent. was paid in gold coin, .00,125 per cent. in silver coin, .31,087, in silver certificates, and .11,313 per cent. in United States notes. While no distinction as to value is made between coin and notes in business transactions, a marked preference is shown for notes, owing to their superior convenience in counting and carrying.

With these facts before him, can any one say that we are not keeping locked up more coin than is necessary? By paying out $100,000,000 of coin on those bonds the amount to be paid between 1881 and 1891 on the principal will be only $537,350,600, or less than $55,000,000 a year. We paid annually on our public debt, from 1865 to 1879, an average of more than $57,000,000.

COINAGE OF SILVER.

Mr. Chairman, we can add greatly to our ability to pay by the coinage of silver. When our bonds were first issued there was no law requiring their payment in coin. But as coin was much more valuable than the greenbacks, the holders of bonds clamored till they got a statutory agreement from Congress that they should be paid in coin, thus adding without consideration millions to the value of their bonds and the burdens of the people. We had cause to hope that here at last the avarice of bondholders would be satisfied; but not so. Encouraged by past triumph, and impelled by a greed which would only rest satisfied with payment made in the most precious metal, Congress was asked, in view of the fact that the gold was more valuable than the silver dollar, to demonetize silver, and thereby pay our immense debt in gold alone. And in disregard of every principle of justice and every interest of the people, silver was demonetized, and the single or gold standard established. The Bible tells us that Abraham bought the burial place for his people with "thirty pieces of silver." Commentators inform us that the coin miraculously obtained from the fish's mouth to be used in payment of the Saviour's tribute, was silver. The fathers of the Republic established it as a currency to be used in paying the debts incurred for our independence. It had been good enough to pay for the sufferings and sacrifices of our forefathers. It had been good enough to purchase a last resting place for God's chosen people. It had been good enough to pay the tribute due from the Son of God and the Saviour of the world. But it was declared by the republican Congress and republican President not good enough for the holders of United States bonds, and the silver dollar was demonetized.

But the people hurled from power those who had demonetized silver, and sent here a Congress which passed a bill for silver coinage. The President vetoed it and popular will was so strong that even over the veto a bill was passed requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to have coined not less than twenty-four million dollars' worth of silver annually. Discretion was given the Secretary to coin two or four million dollars' worth per month.

HOW DID THE SECRETARY USE THE DISCRETION?

I regret, Mr. Chairman, to have to say that he used it against his people, by coining the least amount the law allowed him to coin instead of the greatest. According to law we have a right to pay our bonds in silver dollars of 412½ grains' weight, or in gold of 25.8 grains. Upon this all are agreed. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, tells us that the difference between the cost of silver bullion coined into silver dollars and the face value of the dollars coined therefrom from February 28, 1878, the date of the act authorizing their coinage, to November, 1880, is $8,520,871. This has been made by the Government by the coinage of $2,000,000 a month. It amounts to $258,208 a month, or more than $8,220 a day. It would be double this if the Secretary had coined four million dollars' worth of silver monthly instead of two. He thus costs the country more than $8,200 a day by refusing to coin our silver as he is authorized to do, and is, I am constrained to say, a very dear luxury.

HE RECOMMENDS THAT THE COINAGE OF SILVER BE STOPPED.

The following extract from the Secretary's report shows that he is not content with the $8,000 daily loss he entails upon the country by refusing to fully carry out the law for silver coinage, but that he is determined not to ground the arms of his opposition to "the dollar of our fathers" while there is one extant containing less than 450 grains of silver:

For these reasons the Secretary respectfully but earnestly recommends that the further compulsory coinage of the silver dollar be suspended, or, as an alternative, that the number of grains of silver in the dollar be increased so as to make it equal in market value to the gold dollar, and that its coinage be left as other coinage to the Secretary of the Treasury or the Director of the Mint, to depend upon the demand for it by the public for convenient circulation.

What would be the effect of increasing the weight of the silver dollar till it is equal in value to the gold dollar? It would be raised from 412½ grains to 450 grains. When discharging our public debt in silver, as we have a legal and moral right to do now, we would give by this proposed law 37½ grains on every dollar as a gratuity, which upon the entire debt would amount to more than one hundred and fifty millions, and our liabilities would be increased to that degree. Private debts would be affected in the same way and millions would thereby be added to the burdens of the debtor class and to the fortunes of the creditor class. Yet the President favors it; the Secretary of the Treasury urges it, and a large class in the country abuse those who refuse to accede to it.

Mr. Chairman, suppose I contract a debt with my neighbor and we agree that it may be paid in oats at 25½ cents a bushel or wheat at 412½ cents a bushel; before pay-day the price of wheat declines; what lawyer would say that because of this the debtor could not pay in wheat without putting more pounds in the bushel? What moralist would say he should not? What creditor less relenting than Shylock would say he ought not? But it is insisted that the gold and silver dollars are unequal in value and that they should be made equal. If the people's representatives were to try to make the equalization by taking some grains out of the gold dollar instead of adding some to the silver dollar, a terrific yell would be raised because there was an attempt to violate the contract. What we as the representatives of the people desire is to carry out the contract. We demand nothing more; we will accept nothing less. When we get out of debt it will be time enough to talk of increasing the weight of the silver dollar. To do so now would be a political crime against the people which would not and should not be forgiven.

NATIONAL BANKS.

It is urged that if we pass a bill reducing the rate of interest on United States bonds the national banks will be forced to give way and go out of business. Suppose they should, what Representative has a right to complain if the welfare of the people and economy in government demand it? Is the Government created for the banks, or were the banks brought into existence for the good of the Government? Is it contemplated that the national banks are to be perpetual? This should not be, and cannot be on the present basis, without the perpetuation of our bonded indebtedness. Whenever the public debt ceases the national banks die. No man on this floor will be rash enough to insist that to make our debt everlasting would not be a curse. Every President and patriot who has written or spoken on the subject has warned us against continuing public debts longer than was absolutely necessary. In answer to the argument that it will force national banks out of business, let me say that I am in favor of the Government issuing the currency directly instead of indirectly, as it now does through the banks. To-day we print the money, and upon the banks depositing United States bonds with the Treasurer we turn over to them national-bank notes and let them put them in circulation. We pay them interest on the bonds to give the people a currency.

The money paid to national banks since their organization as interest on the bonds deposited by them to secure their circulation amounts, if I err not, to about two hundred and fifty millions of dollars. Nearly two-thirds as much as the bonds themselves. I fail to see the statesmanship in that policy which pays banking corporations so much to issue currency which might be issued by the Government without cost. Much has been said by the advocates of national banks in this discussion about the taxes the banks pay to the Government. I have examined into the matter, and find that they have paid, all told, upon their circulation less than fifty millions of dollars. Representatives will readily see the vast difference between the amount they have received from the Government and the amount they have paid to it, and will observe by the comparison that they have made between one hundred and fifty and two hundred millions of dollars.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard it urged here by the advocates of national banks that it will not do to intrust the currency to Congress; that there would be danger of inflation, &c. Yes, I have heard this argument advanced by members of Congress themselves; I heard it with astonishment, and I believed that it was not true. I should be sad indeed if I thought that that body of legislators to whom is intrusted the destiny of this great Republic, the lives and liberties of its citizens, is not fit, from stupidity or corruption, to control its currency.

Do gentlemen making this assertion forget that Congress might any day increase the volume of currency or strike down greenbacks, and that it has control of the currency to this extent and never has abused the power? The argument is a weak one.

"The spider's most attenuated web
Is cord, is cable" compared to it.

The national banks may inflate the currency at will. So may Congress. The question to be determined is, which are most to be intrusted with fixing the volume of currency, the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, who have no financial interest of their own to subserve, and are elected and sworn to discharge their duty to the whole country faithfully, or 2,095 national banks, whose officers are not chosen by the masses of the people, and not acting under oath, with no interest to serve except that of the national banks? It is passing strange that any man will admit here that he lacks the intelligence or the integrity to discharge the duties his office devolves upon him.

It has been asked whether the currency which the Government would furnish, if the banks were dispensed with, would be sound. In response, I need only say that when you present your note to the national bank for redemption it pays you in United States notes, and not in coin. Its charter only requires it to redeem in greenbacks, and you get United States currency at last. A law authorizing the issuance of United States Treasury notes, receivable in all dues to the Government, redeemable in coin, and never to be issued under par, and the amount outstanding not to be increased when they were below par, could not be unsafe. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an extract from the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the value of Treasury notes as a currency.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States notes are now in form, security, and convenience the best circulating medium known. The objection is made that they are issued by the Government, and that it is not the business of the Government to furnish paper money, but only to coin money. The answer is that the Government had to borrow money, and is still in debt. The United States note, to the extent that it is willingly taken by the people, and can, beyond question, be maintained at par in coin, is the least burdensome form of debt. The loss of interest in maintaining the resumption fund, and the cost of printing and engraving the present amount of United States notes, is less than one-half the interest on an equal sum of 4 per cent. bonds. The public thus saves over seven million dollars of annual interest, and secures a safe and convenient medium of exchange, and has the assurance that a sufficient reserve in coin will be retained in the Treasury beyond the temptation of diminution such as always attends reserves held by banks.

Another objection to the issue of United States notes is, that they are made a legal tender in the payment of debts. The question of the constitutional power of Congress to make them such, is one for another branch of the Government. The Secretary of the Treasury is still of the opinion that this quality of legal tender does not add to the usefulness, safety, or circulation of United States notes. So far as it excites distrust and opposition to this form of circulating notes it is a detriment. The fear that a withdrawal of this attribute will contract the currency is as delusive as was the fear that resumption would have a like effect. The notes would still be received and paid out by the Government, and, like bank-notes, would not be refused in payment for debts while they were redeemable and promptly redeemed in coin on presentation.

Mr. McMILLIN. These are the views of one who cannot be accused of too great a partiality for greenbacks.

If we would dispense with national banks, and issue such Treasury notes as may be issued under the Constitution to take the place of national-bank notes, we would thereby obtain a fund of more than three hundred millions, to be used in the extinguishment of our debt by purchase of the bonds or other lawful means. Our population increases about 3 per cent. per annum and our commerce with equal rapidity. This requires an increase of currency to correspond. If the Government should issue it instead of hiring banks to do so we would have a large fund annually with which to pay our debts and expenses. By pursuing this policy vigorously instead of the one now followed, we could lawfully pay every dollar of our bonded debt in twenty years, instead of sending it down to oppress children whose fathers are yet unborn.

Mr. Chairman, I offered an amendment, which has been read, providing that the bonds issued under this act shall be subject to taxation as any other property. I regard this as a very important and most salutary amendment. I know that it is said that such a provision will tend to increase the rate of interest that we will have to pay; but I believe that, rising above everything else, public policy demands that they should be taxable. That the taxation of the people should be equal and uniform nobody on or off this floor will deny. It is in accordance with the spirit of our institutions that no one class of the community should be free from the duties which the framers of the Government intended should be imposed upon all.

No class, however humble, should feel that there is another class owning millions of property, worth a thousand times more than they are, and yet not being required to contribute to the support of the Government. There is nothing so likely to breed discontent and undermine the foundations of our free institutions as a feeling on the part of the masses of the people that injustice is done them. Take an example. It has been announced here that Mr. Vanderbilt owns one-thirtieth of the outstanding bonds of the United States. Upon this he draws annually more than $2,000,000 interest. How much does he pay to the support of the Government of the United States, the city of New York, the State of New York, and the county in which he lives upon this colossal fortune?

The poor, humble man who owns nothing but the clothes he wears and, perhaps, the cabin in which he lives, pays more of taxes whenever he strikes a single friction match at midnight to ascertain what has caused the cries of his child—the heir to his poverty—than Vanderbilt pays upon this immense fortune in ten years. Where is the equity in such a system? Where the principle of political economy which justifies it? We search in vain for them. Let us, whenever bonds are to be issued, make them subject to taxation, that those who own them may pay their proper proportion of the taxes necessary to support the Government.

EXPENSES OF THIS GOVERNMENT.

When we look at the expenses of this Government and see the immensity of the taxes, we are appalled. I speak not now of county taxes, State taxes, or municipal taxes, for over these we have no control. The Secretary's report shows that the ordinary receipts of the Government last year from all sources was $333,526,610, a sum so vast that we can only comprehend it by comparison. It is more than thirty-eight thousand dollars an hour, more than six hundred and thirty dollars a minute. With this great financial weight resting upon us it behooves us to prevent every dollar of expenditure we can by stopping and lowering interest.

LET US PAY THE DEBT AS FAST AS POSSIBLE.

I am in favor of paying the public debt instead of perpetuating it, because by doing so we lift from our people a weight which will otherwise descend upon generation after generation, and because we ought to keep ourselves in a condition not to be embarrassed should we ever have difficulties with foreign countries. I favor it, because when this is done there will be no longer any excuse to keep up the onerous, discriminating, unjust, and unwarranted protective tariff which, by its inequalities, now curses the country. I favor it, because when it is paid the system of internal revenue which now sends United States officials to every town and across every threshold in the land can be done away with. I favor it, because when we have paid off the bonds we will have dug down and taken out the foundations of the national banking corporations which have been fostered, as they should not have been, and which, as stated above, have been paid more than $200,000,000 to issue a currency to the people. I favor it, because I believe that a permanent public debt in a republican government is a constant threat and menace to free institutions, by making it necessary to have swarms of government officials ready to do political service on short notice to whatever party may have brought them into existence. And because I favor its extinguishment, I shall favor substituting short-time Treasury notes whenever it can be done, and upon that portion of the bonds for which we cannot substitute Treasury notes I am in favor of reducing the interest to the lowest per cent. obtainable, for that will enable us to apply the millions of interest annually saved to the extinguishment of the principal of the debt.

I would violate no contract, but would pay the debt the earliest day practicable. I look forward with pleasure to the time when the last dollar shall have been paid, and I would behold with deep grief any measure which threatened to make it permanent.

Refunding of the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. A. J. WARNER

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 18, 1881,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. WARNER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: In his speech some days ago (January 6) the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] quoted from a speech made in this House by General Garfield, now President-elect, on which great stress was laid both on account of its distinguished author and because of the financial doctrine advocated. This doctrine is so often repeated and so generally accepted that it seems to me that something more than a passing notice is demanded of those who question its soundness. I do not propose to speak of General Garfield as authority on such questions; that is not necessary, for authority, however high, establishes nothing in science, and especially is this true in economic science. And if it were a question of authority on the points raised General Garfield and the gentleman from New York who follows him, would not, I fear, be found with the majority among those recognized as standing highest as authorities on such questions. But authority aside, the question is one respecting the correctness of the principles laid down in the quotations referred to. The gentleman from New York said:

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk to read an extract from a speech made by General Garfield on the 13th of July, 1876, which is a better answer than I can give to those who insist upon paying the national debt in silver.

The Clerk read as follows:

"It is claimed that, by the terms of the act of 1869, it would be lawful for us to pay the public debt in silver dollars such as might have been coined under the law as it stood in 1861.

"Now I desire to recall to the mind of the House the letter and the spirit of that law. After all the doubt and the turbulent excitement about what the actual obligation of the nation was in regard to the public debt, the first act of the Congress approved by President Grant made a solemn declaration designed to put all those doubts to rest. It was declared by Congress that—

"'The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment'—

"In what? Not in silver, not in gold, not in coin, but—

"'in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.'

"The declaration there was that the payment of all these national obligations not specifically currency obligations was to be in 'coin or its equivalent.' Now, what did Congress mean? What were our laws before 1861? Why, Mr. Speaker, since 1834 we have had one standard, a dollar; and we have by law embodied it in two metals, gold and silver. But all the time, in order to have one standard, not two, we have sought to make the coins of the two metals conform to the one standard; keeping the amount of metal in one so adjusted to the amount of metal in the other that a dollar of gold should be equivalent to a dollar of silver. Every hour that we had a double standard it was double only on the ground of equivalency; and when by reason of the shifting value of the two metals in reference to each other the silver dollar and the gold dollar have varied from each other in value Congress has undertaken to equalize them by increasing the amount of metal in one or decreasing the amount of metal in the other. We always sought to avoid the evil of having two kinds of dollar, one worth more than the other. And when Congress promised to pay in coin it was a promise to pay gold coin or silver coin of equal value to the same nominal sum in gold. I cannot believe that this statement will be denied."

I will add as a basis for further comment another extract from the same speech from which the above is taken. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 13, 1876, page 4561.)

Let it be remembered that we are solemnly bound by the act of 1869 to pay in coin or its equivalent. Dare any man say that we can pay in this so greatly depreciated silver and really obey the law of equivalency which was the basis and spirit of the statute of 1869? He denies the principle of equivalency who proposes to pay in this silver coin. He violates the law who violates the essential object of it—equivalency.

If you insist on paying in silver, then I insist that your silver dollar must be made equivalent to your gold dollar. Do gentlemen consent to maintain equivalency in the two standards and then pay in silver? Manifestly not; their incentive is gone the moment they are asked to pay one hundred cents on the dollar. Some one has said that there is an innate desire in the human mind to get a chance to cheat somebody. A great minister once said that there were two things in human nature which, when united, always made iniquity complete—one was the desire to do a dishonorable thing, and the other was the opportunity to do it. It has happened in the fluctuations of these metals that there is now a notable opportunity to cheat several millions of men by adopting the baser metal as the standard of payment, and thus accomplishing a swindle on so grand a scale as to make the achievement illustrious. By the proposed measure one-fifth of the enormous aggregate of public and private debts can be wiped out as with a sponge. This nation owes $2,100,000,000, and private citizens of the United States probably owe $2,500,000,000, possibly more. At the present moment the relation of the debtor and creditor in the United States involves nearly five billion dollars. It is proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Landers] that at one fell stroke one-fifth of all this enormous sum shall be wiped off, repudiated, and that this process shall be called honest legislation! Since I have been in public life I have never known any proposition that contained so many of the essential elements of vast rascality, of colossal swindling, as this.

After the reading of the quotation made by the gentleman from New York I asked to have read to accompany it the Matthews concurrent resolutions, which passed the House January 27, 1878, having previously passed the Senate, but the gentleman declined to permit the resolution to be then read, and hence, before proceeding to examine the principles so authoritatively laid down in the quoted extracts, I insert the resolutions referred to as being in themselves a sufficient answer to General Garfield's interpretation of the act of 1869:

Whereas by the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869, it was provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemnly pledged to the payment, in coin or its equivalent, of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had expressly provided that the same might be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver; and

Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued by the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act were declared to be redeemable in coin of the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semi-annually in such coin; and

Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, are required to be of the description of bonds of the United States described in said act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt;" and

Whereas at the date of the passage of said act of Congress last aforesaid, to wit, the 14th day of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value of that date included silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains each, declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States,'" to be a legal tender of payment, according to their nominal value for any sums whatever: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring therein,) That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars of the coinage of the United States containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

I will also add by way of further interpretation of the act of 1869, and also as bearing on the character of certain of the bonds proposed to be redeemed by the bill under consideration, some extracts from a speech made in 1868, by Mr. Sherman, then chairman of the Finance Committee in the Senate and now Secretary of the Treasury. (See Appendix to Congressional Globe, February 27, 1868, pages 182–184.)

When we look at the law, which is the contract, it so happens that the identical act which provided for the legal-tenders also provides for the 5-20 bonds. Every man who bought a bond bought it under an act which also provides for the legal-tenders. They were contemporaneous. However, the notes were issued before the bonds were issued. The notes were all outstanding before a single bond was issued.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the limit of the legal-tenders?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will come to that presently. Now, this legal-tender clause provides that—

"Such notes herein authorized shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin, and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid."

Does not this act, in so many words, declare that while coin shall be paid for the interest of the public debt, yet the notes provided by this act shall be a lawful tender in payment of all public debts? * * * Finally, after long consideration—for the subject was debated over and over again—the Committee on Finance agreed upon the act to which I will now refer, the act of March 3, 1863. That act repealed the limit as to the amount of circulation, and raised it to $450,000,000; and it also took away the right to convert, which the Secretary said was the other restriction that prevented the sale of the bonds; and by an ingenious device, suggested by the then Senator from Vermont, (Mr. Collamer,) it was proposed to limit to the holders of the outstanding greenbacks the right to convert them up to the 1st of July then next; but if they did not do so by that time, the right was to cease.

By this legislation in the act of March 3, 1863, the limitations which prevented the sale of the first 5-20 bonds were repealed, and then, for the first time, this loan was taken. Then it was that an agency was organized, and means were taken to spread these bonds all over the country, and they were sold; but they were not sold until these restrictions were removed, and they were sold upon a basis of $450,000,000 without the right of redemption, with no privilege whatever except that of being receivable in payment of taxes. That was the state of the law upon which the legal right of the holders of the five-twenties rests. They refused to buy these bonds upon the terms of the act of February 25, 1862. They did buy them under the act of March 3, 1863, and it is idle to rest their claims upon restrictions repealed before their bonds were issued.

I wish to read a little further to show that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Chase, a year afterward, in December, 1863, in his report, again stated that Congress having relieved him from the restrictions of the act of 1862 enabled him to sell the 5-20 bonds. He says:

"On that day, March 3, 1863, the act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government received the approval of the President and became a law. In addition to various provisions for loans it contained clauses repealing the restrictions affecting the the negotiation of the five-twenties, and thus disengaged that important loan from the embarrassments which had previously rendered it almost unavailable."

Then he goes on and says that every dollar of it was sold in a short time, presenting a remarkable case of success; but it was not sold as my friend from Vermont says, under the act of February 25, 1862. On the contrary, there was an utter failure to sell the loan under that act. It was sold under the subsequent law which repealed the restrictions of the act of 1862, and it was sold upon a basis of currency amounting to $450,000,000, and when the notes had been so depreciated by our legislation, purposely, for wise purposes, when the right to fund was taken away, and no right was given to these notes except to be paid to the Government in the way of taxes.

And again:

I say that equity and justice are amply satisfied if we redeem these bonds at the end of five years in the same kind of money, of the same intrinsic value it bore at the time they were issued. Gentlemen may reason about this matter over and over again, and they cannot come to any other conclusion; at least, that has been my conclusion after the most careful consideration. Senators are sometimes in the habit, in order to defeat the argument of an antagonist, of saying that this is repudiation. Why, sir, every citizen of the United States has conformed his business to the legal-tender clause. He has collected and paid his debts accordingly. Every State in this Union without exception has made its contracts since the legal-tender clause in currency and paid them in currency.

General Garfield's reasoning when analyzed amounts to this:

First. The faith of the Government by the act of 1869 was pledged to the payment of the bonds "in coin or its equivalent." So far, correct.

Second. By "equivalent" is meant that coin of one metal shall be made and kept equal in value to coin of the other metal.

Third. Therefore the bullion value of silver coin must be made equal to the bullion value of gold coin. For, he says:

When Congress promised to pay in coin it was a promise to pay gold coin or silver coin of equal value to the same nominal sum in gold.

But when was such a promise made? Where, pray, is such a pledge to be found? General Garfield begs the whole question in his conclusion. Why not say when Congress promised to pay in coin it was a promise to pay silver coin or gold coin of equal value to the same nominal sum in silver? Is not that proposition as true as the other? Does it not follow just as logically from the assumed premises? And if we go behind the given premises, surely we have much stronger reasons for the support of the latter conclusion than the former. The silver dollar is much the older unit of value; much the older standard, if you please. The pure silver in the dollar has never been changed. The weight of the gold dollar has been changed. Was General Garfield conscious of the sophistry so apparent both in the premises and the conclusion when he added: "I cannot believe that this statement will be denied?" The wonder is that such a statement was ever made.

In the first place, the pledge of 1869 to pay in coin or its equivalent means just what it purports to mean—that the Government will pay in coin—the coin then known to the law, or, if in paper, in paper equivalent to coin. It had no reference to the ratio of metal in the coins of the different metals. That question was not up at all in 1869, and was not thought of. But to make his reasoning appear the more plausible, General Garfield introduces a fiction, and a strange fiction it is, too. He says: "Since 1834 we have had one standard—a dollar." Our standard is not gold, nor silver, not one metal nor both metals—but "a dollar." And he goes on, "We have sought to make the coins of the two metals conform to the one standard"—that is, the dollar.

This goes beyond ordinary fiction. It sets up a name, a denomination, an ideal unit, and proposes to make coins conform to it by varying the metal in the coins. Montesquieu had a fancy that "there are real and ideal moneys," and instanced the African macute as such an ideal standard; and Sir James Steuart, following him, built up a theory of money on such an ideal. Stephen Colwell also, in some respects an able writer, became entangled with such an idea. But that an abstraction can be a standard is absurd; and for my part I should not know where to look for so much bad logic, ably used, as in the quotation under consideration. "Dollar" is the name given to our money unit, which, by the law of 1792, was to be the same weight of silver as the Spanish milled dollar then in general circulation in all the States.

There is no dispute about the desirability of so regulating the ratio of the metals in gold and silver coins as to make the coin value of the two metals correspond respectively with their bullion value. But the assumption that the gold metal must be taken as the standard by which to measure the other is unwarranted by law or logic. I do not propose to discuss here the question of ratio. If it were possible for one country alone to maintain such ratio as it might fix, I should favor the adoption of a ratio that would make the coin value of the metals correspond respectively with their bullion value and with each other; but since every one who has examined the question must admit that such a result can only be secured by international concurrence, for us to enter upon such a line of policy alone would tend rather to more unsettle than to settle the question of ratio.

But in any event to claim that to coin dollars of 412½ grains of silver and make them legal tender is a fraud upon creditors, is to talk without comprehending the full scope of the question. Under limited coinage silver dollars will buy just as much of anything in this country as gold dollars will. But this aside.

On what ground is it assumed that gold is to be taken as the standard by which silver is to be measured? How does it appear that there are not a hundred cents in a silver dollar? Has the value of gold changed not at all? Is all the change in the silver? No such thing can be proven. On the contrary, compared with commodities gold has risen in the markets of the world; compared with commodities silver has not fallen. But suppose it had, by what right does the creditor come in and demand gold? What is legal tender for? To enable the creditor to choose the kind of money he will take? The Comptroller of the Currency would seem to think so. He says:

Sooner or later the time will come when the creditors of the bank will prefer payment in the dearer metal, and the refusal to pay the kind of coin asked for by the creditor who has the option will bring down the cheaper coin to its value in the markets of the world.

It has long been known that this officer, although paid from the public Treasury, serves only the banks, and from the above quotation from his report it would almost seem as though he was even ready to sacrifice his wits in their behalf. What would be the use of legal tender if the creditor holds the option? The option belongs to the debtor always, and every contract and every money obligation in the land is based on that right. Suppose A contracts with B to discharge a certain obligation in corn at fifty cents a bushel, or wheat at $1 a bushel. Suppose in the mean time corn becomes the more plentiful and wheat scarcer, shall A be made to pay in wheat or to give more corn to the bushel? Every one who promised under the law as it existed in 1869 or 1870, or who promises under the law as it exists now, to pay coin at a future time, promises to pay gold coin or silver coin at his option, and every acceptor of such a promise accepts it on such conditions. There is no obligation of equivalency anywhere involved. That is simply a question of government policy, and nothing more. It is an important question, I admit, and one we have tried to settle in the only way by which it can be settled—by international concurrence.

Bimetallism, however, does not rest upon any expressed or implied obligation to change the ratio of metal in coins. It rests, rather, upon the option to pay in either coin. The par of coins, in fact, can only be maintained, even with international concurrence, by resting the option with the debtor. If one metal, then, from any cause, by even a small fraction, falls or tends to fall, that metal is at once taken up by everybody who has payments to make, and by extending its use its value is upheld; at the same time the other metal is left and its use thereby lessened till it falls to the level of the first, or till the two meet on that plane where option has no value.

It is, I conceive, no longer an open question or a matter of doubt, that if the same ratio could be agreed upon even between the United States, Germany, France, and the other States of the Latin Union, the two metals would circulate together, being upheld by the option in the debtor operating alternately in different places, perhaps, on the one and then on the other. The option is the pivotal point on which bimetallism turns.

I here quote from a recent paper by the eminent economist, Emile De Laveleye, which ably sets forth the principles of bimetallism:

Bimetallism simply declares that all debts contracted in a country can be paid by a weight in gold, or, adopting the ratio of the Latin Union, by fifteen and a half times this weight in silver. The relative value can change, and probably will. But the nature of the contract remains the same. Each monetary debt is an alternative obligation. It may be claimed that the system offers more disadvantages than advantages; that point requires examination; but it cannot be said that it is absurd or unjust. Alternative obligations are recognized under all codes, and no creditor can complain of them since he enters into the contract under the empire of a law of which he has full cognizance, and which is maintained.

The fear is often expressed that by continuing the coinage of silver we may be left with a single silver standard. That is impossible. In the first place, it might be shown that the par of silver coin and gold coin would not be disturbed until silver enough had been coined to nearly take the place of all the gold in the country; but even then the standard would not be silver alone. Let me illustrate. Suppose England and the United States to possess each $500,000,000 of metallic money, or together $1,000,000,000. The international valuation would be the same whether each country had $250,000,000 of gold and $250,000,000 of silver, or one possessed $500,000,000 of gold and the other $500,000,000 of silver. But let one of the metals be abolished and the other divided between the two countries, allowing to each but $250,000,000 altogether, and then a single standard would in fact be set up, and the valuation of the wealth of the two countries would be reduced one-half. There is no danger of the abandonment of gold, and hence a single silver standard, or an exclusive silver valuation, is out of the question.

The danger is all from the abandonment of silver. And every one ought to know that the abandonment of silver must result in an enormous increase in the value of gold. The gold in the world applied to monetary use may be taken at ten thousand tons. If the equivalent in gold, at the ratio of 16 to 1, of the silver used as money, be taken at ten thousand tons more, then the whole stock of the money metals for the world would be equal to twenty thousand tons of gold. Everybody can understand the effect of a reduction to half this stock.

Is it possible that gentlemen sitting in bank parlors can plan, and through the aid of legislation carry out, schemes for such vast spoliation as must follow the alteration in the value of money that would take place—and has already in some measure taken place—by the demonetization of silver? Why, such world-plundering was never dreamed of by the Alarics and the Attilas of the Middle Ages.

It took physical courage and great endurance on the part of Roman leaders and Roman legions to subdue and subject conquered provinces to perpetual tribute.

It was the barbarian Calgacus who, in the speech put in his mouth by Tacitus, called these conquerers raptores orbis—plunderers of the world—"exhausting the land by their devastations," "unsatiated by the east and by the west."

But history affords no example of such avarice and wantonness as is manifested in the scheme of modern money manipulators to double the money standard and thereby doubly mortgage the industry and earnings of generations unborn. Think of such a change in connection with the overwhelming debts of the world! I make no war on capital. He who earns and saves, who makes sacrifices to-day that he may have more to-morrow, whether it be one dollar or a million, is a benefactor and a capitalist, and the social compact fails if he is not protected in its free use. But when capitalists combine to ask governments to give them power to spoliate whole nations by changing the money scale, I say they seek by new methods to accomplish what the old sea-kings of the Middle Ages undertook by open piratical maraudings.

What can General Garfield mean, then, when he talks of the "vast rascality" connected with the restoration of silver? From what school of philosophy were such ethics derived? Or did his zeal to serve those who flattered blind even so great an intellect?

The question of the future supply of the metals, too, becomes one of the greatest importance in this connection. Population ever increases, and trade, if not hampered, increases still faster. Economists tell us that the supply of the precious metals has at all times had a marked influence on the commerce and prosperity of the world. And nothing perhaps contributed more to the downfall of the Roman Empire, and with it the earlier civilizations of the world, than the falling off in the supply of the precious metals.

Geologists tell us now again that the gold supply must necessarily in the future be a diminishing quantity. With the world's commerce multiplied as it has been in the last thirty years, and a century hence there can scarcely be more gold applicable to monetary uses than would be required to settle international balances alone. On the other hand, there is not the least danger that the supply of both metals will be excessive. Sir Roderick Murchison said:

> The quantities of gold and silver procurable will prove no more than sufficient to meet the exigencies of an enormously increased population and an augmenting commerce and industry.

Mr. J. S. Newberry, in a recent lecture, referring to the yield of the mines of the United States, said:

> There has been an outcry that there would be an overproduction of silver. But past history shows us that this cannot be the case. At Leadville it is at present easy of access, but it is not so elsewhere. There are no indications of an oversupply, but there will be a steady flow of gold and silver, varying from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000 annually, for years to come. The result of all my observations for the last twenty years is that gold and silver will not glut the market.

I give the opinions of these high authorities in addition to the opinion of M. Sass, quoted by Laveleye. Why, the entire gold production of the world for 1879 did not exceed eight cents per capita, an amount equal, say, to $3 to each person for the average life-time of a generation, which is hardly more than the bad teeth of later generations take up.

I quote again from Laveleye on the disadvantage of monometallism:

> Thus the disadvantages of gold monometallism would be to inflict a considerable loss on the states which tried to adopt it. But that is a secondary point. The great evil—and we must say it, the great iniquity—is, that it would alter the basis of all contracts and to the detriment of the debtors. The expulsion of silver would naturally lead to a great reduction in prices, and for two reasons: first, because the metallic instrument of exchange would probably be reduced one-third; secondly, because, as the number of exchanges is constantly increasing, gold alone would not suffice as a means of payment unless there was a considerable lowering in prices. The production of gold has been diminishing for several years. The eminent geologist of Vienna, M. Sass, has shown in his book, Zukunft des Goldes, that in the future, except in very rare cases, less and less gold will be found; and he concludes therefrom that gold alone would be utterly insufficient as a universal money.
> Here a question of equity suggests itself. Has a State the right, except in cases of absolute necessity, to modify the basis of contracts, and to overwhelm debtors for the benefit of creditors? Can a more iniquitous, a more anti-democratic measure be conceived than one which should take from the tax-payers the right which they have acquired and possess, to pay in either gold or silver the sum they owe to the capitalists who have lent money to the Government, and which would oblige them to pay their debt in gold only, when at the same time this measure would inevitably and greatly heighten the value of the metals?
> Not only does this deprive the debtor or tax-payer of his alternative, but it increases to an unknown and certainly to an enormous extent the price of the only metal with which they can henceforth pay their debt. Think of the numerous classes who would fall victims to this iniquity; not only all tax-payers, that is to say, to a greater or less extent, every individual, but also and more particularly all mortgagors, and I believe the mortgage debts in Europe amount to about forty or fifty billion francs, (£1,600,000,000, or £2,000,000,000.) Add to these all farmers who, in order to pay a fixed rent in gold, would be obliged to sell a larger quantity of provisions, as all products would have fallen in price. It is when living in the country that one sees all the suffering, all the misery, that a fall in prices occasions, and one feels indignant at the bare idea of such injustice.
> Second. Monometallism and the fall in prices which would be the result of it would lead to a long crisis, attacking both industry and commerce, and indeed all economical activity.

This eminent French economist, it will be seen, takes quite a different view of bimetallism from that taken by General Garfield. Again, although not strictly pertinent to the bill under consideration, I desire to notice still another quotation from the same distinguished source, General Garfield, made by the gentleman from New York in the speech referred to:

> Mr. Garfield on the 16th of November, 1877, uttered these words:
> "I want it remembered in the outset that the greenback currency was, and is so known in the courts, and so known everywhere, a forced loan—a forced loan by the Government upon its Army and upon its other creditors, to meet the great emergencies of the war; and the primary fact connected with every greenback is that it is a promise to pay."

It has been quite common, ever since its issue, to speak of the greenback currency as a forced loan. Now, with due deference to the distinguished author of this quotation, I maintain that there is nothing whatever of the character of a forced loan connected with the issue of greenbacks. Greenbacks on their face are promises to pay, but that is not all they are. Mr. Chase spoke of them as "debt made into money." In the final analysis of the problem greenbacks in their first issue constituted a tax, and nothing else. It was a very unequal tax, but nevertheless that is what it was. I will try to make this appear. At the beginning of the war the whole volume of money in the United States, paper and coin, was a little less than $500,000,000. Having issued $500,000,000 to take the place of the previously existing currency, if then $500,000,000 more were issued, the whole thousand millions, other things remaining the same, was worth no more—that is, had no greater purchasing power—than the $500,000,000; a single unit of the thousand millions had only half the value a single unit of the $500,000,000 would have had. But $500,000,000, or half of the whole money volume, became available for the Government to buy with. They who accepted it for supplies did not loan the supplies, nor did they who sold supplies make a loan of goods. The Government created an economical device, which, though it reduced the purchasing power of the pre-existing money one-half, gave the Government a purchasing power equal to half the whole money volume.

The mere substitution of greenbacks for the money before in use, up to the limit it could be done without depreciation, was a gain to the Government without corresponding loss to any one, but beyond that and to the extent of the depreciation it was a tax, and nothing else, but a most unequal and therefore unjust tax. In the first place it was a tax on every soldier, officer, and employé of the Government to the extent of the depreciation, and, second, it was a tax on every man in whose hands this money depreciated to the extent of the depreciation. The whole money volume, I say, was depreciated by overissues, and that depreciation amounted to a tax, not always directly to the Government, but from one individual to another, little by little, a thousand times over. But the Government got exactly what purchasing power the additional issue of paper primarily possessed, and no more, which, in the case supposed, where a thousand millions were issued to take the place of $500,000,000 existing before, amounted to $250,000,000 of the pre-existing volume, or $500,000,000 of the double volume.

The right conclusion, then, is that men who were fighting the battles got only half dollars where whole dollars were promised them, and paid as tax the other half; or, to put the whole case just as it was, soldiers for fighting battles got one dollar where they were entitled to two, while they who lent their money—and that was mostly after the battles had all been fought and the war was over and the permanency of the Government established—got two dollars where they lent but one and where but one was honestly due. And what is more, the soldier who got but half his pay then has to help during the rest of his life to work out the debt due to the lender. Well might he say, in the language of Shakspeare:

> I have kept back their foes,
> While they have told their money, and let out
> Their coin upon large interest.

But greenbacks are not money, we are answered. Not money! Yet for seventeen years they were the only legal-tender currency in use in this country! With them the greatest and most costly war of modern times was carried on. With them two-thirds of all our railroads have been built, and half of all the wealth now in existence in the United States has been created. They have paid thousands upon thousands of millions of debts, and, in short, have effected more exchanges than any other kind of money ever in use on this side of the Atlantic. And yet we are wisely told they are not and never have been money! And if we had no other money for the next hundred years, or till the judgment day, I can imagine these economists rising up and swearing that we never did have any money at all. It is strange that otherwise logical minds become involved in such a mist.

Grant, if you please, that they are debt—that is not all they are. I say, they possess and they perform all the functions of money, and it is in their character as money that we have to deal with them.

Professor F. A. Walker says: "Plain men know perfectly well that greenbacks are money and have been money these seventeen years." And again, "Money is that money does;" and that is a good definition. Car-wheels are now made of paper. But according to these financial technologists they are not wheels at all but represent wheels made of something else.

There is one important feature in the bill that has not been as much discussed as its merits demand. I refer to the proposition to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to apply part of the coin now in the Treasury to the payment of bonds. I think it can be made to appear that this would be entirely safe and in every view a wise step. In the first place, there is no definite or certain relation necessary to be maintained between coin reserves and a paper circulation. Much depends on how the paper is issued, who issues it, what its money character is, and how it is accepted by the people. And at any rate the value of a paper circulation does not depend wholly on coin reserves.

For instance, if a paper circulation be permitted to exceed the volume of coin the country would have if it had no paper, no amount of coin reserve would keep it from depreciation, and only by reducing the paper volume could its equivalency with coin be maintained. But if an inconvertible paper were in circulation, such as the greenbacks, Bank of England notes, or the state paper money of Germany, the volume might stand without depreciation at the level which a metallic currency would rise to if there were no paper. But if after a time such a paper circulation were made convertible, as our greenbacks have been, then another question arises: what proportion of the whole volume, paper and coin, will the people choose to have in the form of paper and what proportion coin? In other words, when the people are permitted to choose between paper and coin, what will be the state of equilibrium between the two? At the commencement of resumption this was an open question; but it is no longer so. Given the facilities, as now offered for choosing between paper and coin, the state of equilibrium has, it may safely be concluded, I think, been reached. What is this state of equilibrium? The Director of the Mint makes the gold and silver coin and bullion in the country $650,000,000.

This is divided as follows:

Given total coin and bullion in the country		$650,000,000
Held as bullion	$80,000,000
In reserve in the Treasury	130,000,000
In reserve in the banks	120,000,000
Total coin and bullion out of circulation		330,000,000
Leaving coin in circulation		320,000,000
Total paper currency		$690,000,000
Consisting of—
Legal-tender notes	$346,000,000
National-bank notes	344,000,000
Total as above	690,000,000
Of this there is held in banks as legal-tender reserves	$56,000,000
Held in the Treasury as a redemption fund for bank notes and failed banks	34,000,000
Total currency reserve		90,000,000
Leaving paper currency in circulation		600,000,000
Add coin in circulation		320,000,000
Total paper and coin in circulation		920,000,000

And this may be taken as very near the present actual circulation.

Then it follows that the proportion of $600,000,000 of paper, of the character of the paper now in circulation, to from $300,000,000 to $350,000,000 of coin, is a settled state of equilibrium between the two kinds of currency. No doubt if the opportunity were given to everybody in every part of the country to choose between paper and coin in every transaction the proportion would be altered, that is, if redemption facilities were extended to every part of the country the state of equilibrium would be somewhat changed. But I say that the foregoing proportions indicate the state of equilibrium that exists under existing conditions of redemption.

Then why keep $130,000,000 of coin in the Treasury? Is there any possible danger that the time will come when a hundred and thirty millions less paper and a hundred and thirty millions more coin will be wanted, or that the state of equilibrium will change to any such extent? But it is said the time may come when the coin will be wanted for export. But it is impossible for the $600,000,000 of paper now in circulation to expel the coin that is outside of the Treasury, and there are two hundred millions of that not in circulation at all. I cannot conceive, then, what could send greenbacks to the Treasury for coin for export. The paper volume in actual circulation does not, by more than one-third, fill the channels of circulation, and, including reserves and circulation together, amounts to little more than one-half of the total volume.

This amount of paper, then, cannot possibly operate to expel coin from the country any more than a fluid that but partly fills a vessel can expel another fluid. Since, then, no demand is likely to be made on the Treasury for coin, as a consequence of a preference for coin to paper for circulation, and since a demand for coin for export is less likely, for the reason that the coin part of the circulation is now large enough—to say nothing of the large coin reserves and the annual production from the mines—to permit all the outflow at all likely to take place, why, then, keep so large a store in the Treasury? Indeed, if the paper volume be kept within its present limits, the only question the Secretary of the Treasury need consider is how much coin is likely to be called for to satisfy any preference for coin over paper for circulation and that for the last year has been less than $1,000,000. Indeed coin has probably more often gone to the Treasury for paper than paper for coin.

I have not considered, it will be seen, the authority the Secretary possesses to sell any class of bonds if necessary to replenish his stock of coin for resumption purposes. I believe, therefore, that the stock of coin might be reduced by a full hundred millions without endangering in the slightest degree the par of paper and coin. And, moreover, a hundred millions more coin out would tend to lessen the demand for coin. And who, if in debt, would keep his money locked up and pay interest rather than pay the debt?

Electoral Count.

SPEECH OF HON. JAY A. HUBBELL,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 28, 1881,

On the Senate resolution providing for a twenty-second joint rule for counting the electoral vote for President and Vice-President.

The Constitution, in its words, is plain and intelligible, and it is meant for the homebred, unsophisticated understandings of our fellow-citizens.—Dallas in Defense of the Constitution.

There are two kinds of construction—one calculated to maintain, the other to corrupt or destroy the principles upon which governments are established—one visible to common sense, the other consisting of filaments so slender as not to be seen except through some magnifying glass—one which addresses the understanding, the other which addresses prejudice or self-interest. When a man splits his mind, and glues one half to certain principles and the other to a mode of construction by which the same principles are subverted, it is no easy matter to find arguments which will please both halves, &c.

* * * * * * *

With them [all other governments but our own] construction is not a science to preserve the rights of mankind, but an art for extending their own power. Its business is to forge wealth for individuals or combinations, and chains for majorities, to make payment for usurpations in fulsome flatteries and insidious projects. * * * And to furnish parties, factions, combinations, and individuals with concealed dirks to stab liberty.

The framers of our Constitution exerted all their faculties to exclude from our policy this pernicious species of construction by specifications and restrictions. Its wonderful acuteness in misinterpretation was understood and sedulously guarded against. It had often perverted the Scriptures and converted patriotism into treason. Russell and Sidney fell under the edge of constructive treason. The day on which the former was beheaded, the wise and learned University of Oxford, convinced by its doctors in the art of construction, declared every principle by which a free constitution can be maintained to be "impious and heretical"—especially the doctrine that "all civil authority is derived from the people." * * * Which can do most harm to mankind, constructive treason or constructive powers? The first takes away the life of an individual—the second destroys the liberty of a nation. The machine called inference can act as extensively in one case as in the other.—Construction Construed, by John Taylor of Caroline.

Mr. HUBBELL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: What are the duties and powers of Congress in connection with the counting of the votes of the electoral colleges for President and Vice-President of the United States? What its duties and powers under the Constitution? The second clause of section 1 of article 2 of the Constitution declares:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

Article 2 also defines the qualifications of President and Vice-President, and declares that none but those having those qualifications shall be eligible to those offices.

Article 12 of the amendments to the Constitution, after prescribing where and how the electoral colleges thus appointed shall meet and vote, and certify their votes, and transmit them sealed to the President of the Senate, declares:

The President of the Senate—

That is, the Vice-President of the United States—see fourth clause, third section, article 1—

shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the vote shall then be counted;—the person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President, &c.

Now what, under these clauses of the Constitution, are the duties and powers of the two Houses of Congress, separately or in joint session, in reference to the votes of the electoral colleges? Are they those of a grand national canvassing board, invested with high judicial or inquisitorial powers to step within the boundaries of the States and inquire into the manner in which they have executed an important constitutional trust; to examine into and ascertain the character of the elections or the methods or agencies by which electors may be appointed; to inquire into the qualifications of electors or of the candidates for whom they may vote, or into the legality of the proceedings or votes of the colleges? If not, can Congress, either by law or joint resolution, legally assume or exercise such powers? Would not their exercise be a usurpation in Congress, a violent usurpation, and one striking at the very fundamental principles of the Constitution.

To my mind, sir, from the attitude of the dominant majority of this Congress, these are very grave issues, indeed dangerous and alarming issues, involving the integrity of the Constitution, even the liberties and rights of the people and States and the character or form of our government.

I propose, therefore, to examine them in the light of the proceedings of the constitutional convention of 1787, in the light of the recorded speeches and principles of the illustrious and able men who constituted that body as in the light of the Constitution itself, in that of the contemporaneous exposition of the principles and purposes of the framers of the Constitution as embodied in the provisions of that instrument, in the practices hitherto of Congress in reference to the counting of the electoral vote, in the light of the attitudes, character, and principles, since the formation of the Government, of individuals and parties who have favored or attempted the exercise by Congress of such extraordinary and unconstitutional powers, and the fate of such attempts and of the parties and individuals who favored them, under the judgment of the people, the final arbiter, under our system of all political issues, of all issues affecting their liberties and rights and the character or form of government under which they live.

First, as to the constitutional convention and its proceedings which led to the adoption of our Constitution, and the preserved opinions of its leading men.

The convention met at Philadelphia May 15, 1787. It embraced the representatives of twelve of the thirteen colonies or States included in the Confederation—such men as Roger Sherman, John Langdon, Abraham Baldwin, Pierce Butler, Oliver Ellsworth, John Rutledge, Rufus King, Elbridge Gerry, Robert and Gouverneur Morris, James Wilson, Luther Martin, Charles and Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, Edmund Randolph, Benjamin Franklin, George Mason, Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, and George Washington—illustrious and able men, some of whom subsequently under the Constitution filled the highest places of honor and trust.

On May 29 Edmund Randolph moved what was called the Virginia plan of constitution, embraced in a series of seventeen resolutions, of which—

Resolution 7 provided that a national executive be instituted, to be chosen by the national legislature, [Congress,] for the term of ——, &c.—Debates in the Federal Convention of 1787, volume 5 of Elliott's Debates, &c., page 123.

Mr. Randolph favored a triumvirate for the national executive.

On the same day, Mr. Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, "laid before the House" a draught of a constitution, prepared by himself, article 8 of which provided—

The executive power of the United States shall be vested in a President of the United States, which shall be his style; and his title shall be his excellency. He shall be elected for four years, and shall be re-eligible.—Ibid., page 131.

On June 2, Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, moved—

That the States be divided into —— districts, and that the persons qualified to vote in each district for members of the first branch [House of Representatives] of the national legislature elect —— members for their respective districts, to be electors of the executive magistracy, [the President;] that the said electors of the executive magistracy meet at ——, and they, or any —— of them, so met, shall proceed to elect, by ballot, but not out of their own body, —— person in whom the executive authority of the National Government shall be vested.—Ibid., page 143.

On June 13, Mr. Gorham, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of the Whole, in which the various plans, motions, amendments, &c., had been considered, reported, as the result of its proceedings up to that date, a series of nineteen resolutions, the ninth of which provided—

That a national executive be instituted to consist of a single person, to be chosen by the national legislature for the term of seven years, &c.—Ibid., page 190.

It made him "ineligible a second time."

On June 15, Mr. Patterson, of New Jersey, moved what was known as the New Jersey plan of constitution in a series of nine resolutions, the fourth of which provided:

That the United States in Congress be authorized to elect a federal executive, to consist of ——persons; to continue in office for the term of —— years, &c.—Ibid., page 192.

The federal executive "to be ineligible a second time."

On June 18, Alexander Hamilton introduced his "sketch" of a constitution in a series of eleven propositions, the fourth of which provided:

The supreme executive authority of the United States to be vested in a governor, to be elected to serve during good behavior, the election to be made by electors chosen by the people in the election districts aforesaid, &c.—Ibid., page 205.

That is, in the election districts provided for in a previous proposition of his "sketch."

On July 17, Mr. Luther Martin moved that the executive be chosen by electors appointed by the several legislatures of the individual States.

On July 23, the proceedings of the convention up to that date, with the various propositions before it, "for the establishment of a national government," were referred to a committee of detail, consisting of five members, "to prepare and report a constitution conformable thereto."

On July 24, Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, moved that—

The executive be chosen every —— years by —— electors, to be taken by lot from the national legislature, who shall proceed immediately to the choice of the executive, and not separate until it be made.—Ibid., page 362.

Mr. Wilson "did not move this as the best mode," nor as one which he favored. He was for an election by the people.

On July 25, Mr. Ellsworth, of Connecticut, moved—

That the executive be appointed by the legislature, [Congress,] except when the magistrate last chosen shall have continued in office the whole term for which he was chosen, and be re-eligible; in which case the choice shall be by electors appointed by the legislatures of the States for that purpose.—Ibid., page 363.

By such a mode Mr. Ellsworth believed that a "deserving magistrate" might be re-elected, and maintain his independence of Congress. On the same day Elbridge Gerry, of Massachusetts, moved—

That the executive be appointed by the governors and presidents of the States, with the advice of their councils; and, where there are no councils, by electors chosen by the legislatures, &c.—Ibid.

On July 26, the different propositions offered since the 23d, with the proceedings of the convention since that date, were unanimously referred to the committee on detail, and the convention adjourned till August 6, "that the committee might have time to prepare and report the constitution." The proceedings thus referred were embraced in a series of twenty-three resolutions, the twelfth of which—

Resolved, That a national executive be instituted, to consist of a single person; to be chosen by the national legislature for the term of seven years; to be ineligible a second time, &c.—Ibid., page 376.

On August 6, Mr. Rutledge, of South Carolina, from the committee on detail, reported a draught of a constitution, based upon the proceedings referred to it on the 23d and 26th of July. Section 1 of article 10 of this draught read:

The executive power of the United States shall be vested in a single person. His style shall be "the President of the United States of America," and his title shall be "his excellency." He shall be elected by ballot by the legislature, [Congress.] He shall hold his office during the term of seven years, but shall not be elected a second time.—Ibid., page 380.

Between the 6th and 31st of August a number of motions and amendments of more or less importance were offered and adopted or rejected, and on the 31st the proceedings of the convention up to that date were referred to a committee of eleven. On September 4, Mr. Brearly, of New Jersey, from that committee, reported a series of amendments to the resolutions referred to them. Amendment 4 to the article relating to the President provided:

He [the President] shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the vice-president, chosen for the same term, be elected in the following manner, viz: Each State shall appoint, in such manner as its legislature may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the legislature, [Congress.] The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for two persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; and they shall make a list of all the persons voted for, and of the number of votes for each, which list they shall sign, and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the General Government, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in that house [the Senate,] open all the certificates, and the votes shall be then and THERE counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the president, if such number be a majority of that of the electors; and if there be more than one who shall have such a majority and have an equal number of votes, then the Senate shall immediately choose by ballot one of them for president; but if no person have a majority, then, from the five highest on the list, the Senate shall choose by ballot the president, &c.—Ibid., page 507.

Here, in this amendment of the committee of eleven, is the first appearance in the convention of the clause relating to the counting of the electoral votes by the Vice-President. It provides that the certificates shall be opened by the Vice-President in the Senate, and that in that House the votes shall be counted. On several motions the words "in the presence of the senate and house of representatives" were added after the word "counted." Presuming (for it is not so stated in Elliot's debates in the convention) that the words "in that house" were stricken out—for otherwise the added words would render the amendment a meaningless jumble—then the clause as amended read:

The President of the Senate shall open all the certificates, [where?] and the votes shall then be counted in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Still an awkward, if not a meaningless sentence. It was subsequently altered to read as it now stands in the Constitution, but upon whose motion, or by whose authority, is not stated in the report of the debates. It was probably so altered by the committee on detail.

As a whole, this amendment of the committee of eleven to the article constituting the Executive was regarded by the majority of the convention as a decided improvement upon the previous plans. It removed many of the weightiest objections of members to those plans. It provided for the appointment of the President by electors to be chosen by the States under the direction of their legislatures, thus inhibiting all control by Congress over the appointment of the electors, and removing the great and fundamental objection of the majority to a choice of the President by electors; but it also provided that, in the event of a failure of the electors to appoint, the Senate should choose the President—a provision most odious to the majority. Very few, indeed, of the members favored an election of President by Congress, or by electors appointed in any way by either House of Congress, or over which they or either of them would exercise any control. Fewer still favored a choice in any event by the Senate.

In opposition to the eventual appointment by the Senate, Mr. Williamson, of North Carolina, urged:

There are seven States which do not contain one-third of the people. If the Senate are to appoint, less than one-sixth will have the power.—Ibid., page 514.

In that case a minority and not a majority would govern. If the Senate was invested with such a power corruption and intrigue would soon ensue. The President would become "the minion" of the Senate, and, as Mr. Williamson feared, the result would be the establishment of a detestable aristocracy. That view and fear was common to the majority. Hence, by an almost unanimous vote—ayes 10, noes 1 (Delaware)—upon the motion of Mr. Roger Sherman, for the words "the Senate shall immediately choose" was substituted:

The House of Representatives shall immediately choose, by ballot, one of them for president, the members of each State having one vote.—Ibid., page 519.

Nor was that wholly satisfactory. "Many," in the language of Mr. Madison, "considered it a primary object to render an eventual resort to any part of the legislature [Congress] improbable" in the appointment of a President. Hence, Colonel Mason, of Virginia, moved that a plurality only of the electoral votes, instead of a majority, should be necessary to a choice; Mr. Madison and Mr. Williamson that one-third should elect. They clearly saw and urged that intrigue and corruption, the demoralization of both the executive and legislature, would inevitably attend a control by Congress or by either House of Congress, either primarily or eventually, over the appointment of the President.

Other amendments or motions looking to the independence of the executive were made to amendment 4 of the committee of eleven. After the words "may be entitled in the legislature" (Congress) were added:

But no person shall be appointed an elector who is a member of the legislature of the United States, or who holds an office of profit or trust under the United States.—Ibid., page 515.

Neither Congress nor its individual members should control or influence or be interested in the appointment of the President.

Amendment 4 was further amended until the article constituting the national executive assumed the form and language and provisions which it embraced when finally adopted, and which it retained in the Constitution until repealed by article 12 of the amendments.

Now, sir, throughout all the proceedings of the constitutional convention of 1787 the well-defined theory upon which its majority acted was, that the "National Government" should be constituted of three great departments—the executive, legislative, and judiciary—which should be co-ordinate but distinct and independent in their separate spheres. But to raise such a fabric, to construct it of materials and parts and upon a foundation which would endure the machinations and assaults it was certain to encounter from within and without, exacted all their abilities, all their sagacity and skill, and sternly tested all their patriotism. It was a work of infinite difficulty. The result of their labor was long doubtful. But in nothing did they encounter greater difficulty than in the constitution of the Executive. Originally, and up to a late hour, the differences in the convention were apparently as wide as to the proper mode of his appointment as to the powers with which he should be clothed. Consequently, as I have shown, every possible plan was in turn suggested, urged, adopted, and then rejected, until the report of the committee of eleven. But amid all this apparent division of sentiment, all these conflicting plans and motions, and equally conflicting votes of the convention, clearly and distinctly stands out the grand objective purpose of the majority, as finally drafted into the Constitution. It was, that the national Executive should not be a dependent of Congress, that he should not be indebted to it for his appointment, and at the same time subject to its impeachment and removal, and consequently to hold his office at its will and pleasure, as its "mere creature," its subservient tool, its "minion;" but that he should be the President of the nation, wholly independent of the National Legislature, holding his appointment from the people through the States, and armed with the veto as the champion of the States and people against "legislative encroachments," "legislative despotism," "legislative tyranny."

Of that the utterances of its leading men are full of proofs. "A particular objection" of Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, one of the ablest and most influential men in the convention, to an election of the President by the National Legislature was—

That the executive in that case would be too dependent [upon Congress] to stand the mediator between the intrigues and sinister views of the representatives [Congress] and the general liberties and interests of the people.—Ibid., page 323.

Mr. Wilson urged—

In the appointment to great offices, where the legislature might feel many motives not common to the public, confidence was surely misplaced. This branch of business, it was notorious, was the most corruptly managed of any that had been committed to legislative bodies.—Ibid., page 324.

He had previously warned the convention that—

Despotism comes on mankind in different shapes—sometimes in an executive, sometimes in a military one. Is there no danger of a legislative despotism? Theory and practice both proclaim it.—Ibid., page 196.

Hence, in Mr. Wilson's judgment, to invest Congress with the appointment of the President, with the added power of removal through impeachment, would inevitably lead to intrigue, cabal, and corruption, and result finally in "legislative despotism," "legislative tyranny."

Mr. Pierce Butler, of South Carolina, urged:

The two great evils to be avoided [in the appointment of the President] are, cabal at home and influence from abroad. It will be difficult to avoid either if the election be made by the national legislature.—Ibid., page 365.

And in supporting the plan of the committee of eleven, Mr. Butler observed:

The mode was not free from objection, but much more so than an election by the legislature, where, as in elective monarchies, cabal, faction, and violence would be sure to prevail.—Ibid., page 509.

Mr. Elbridge Gerry, of Massachusetts, regarded "an election at all," whether primarily or eventually, "by the national legislature" as "radically and incurably wrong." He urged:

There would be constant intrigue kept up for the appointment. The legislature [Congress] and the candidates would bargain and play into one another's hands. Votes would be given by the former under promises or expectations from the latter of recompensing them by services to members of the legislature [Congress] or their friends.—Ibid., page 144.

Mr. Gouverneur Morris, a distinguished member of the convention from Pennsylvania, and to whose elegant pen as a member of the committee on detail we are indebted for the literary excellence of the Constitution, said:

Of all possible modes of appointment [of President] that by the legislature [Congress] is the worst. If the legislature is to appoint and to impeach, or to influence the impeachment the executive will be the mere creature of it.—Ibid., page 361.

Mr. Morris urged:

He [the President] ought to be elected by the people at large—by the freeholders of the country. * * * If the legislature [Congress] elect it will be the work of intrigue, of cabal, and of faction. It will be like the election of a Pope by a conclave of cardinals—real merit will rarely be the title to the appointment.—Ibid., page 322.

If the executive [President] be chosen by the national legislature he will not be independent of it, and if not independent usurpation and tyranny on the part of the legislature will be the consequence. This was the case in England in the last century. It has been the case in Holland where their senates have engrossed all power. It has been the case everywhere. He was surprised that an election by the people at large should ever have been likened to the Polish election of the first magistrate. An election by the legislature [Congress] will bear a real likeness to the election by the Diet of Poland. The great must be the electors in both cases, and the corruption and cabal which are known to characterize the one would soon find their way into the other.—Ibid., page 323.

Again, he urged:

One great object of the executive is to control the legislature. The legislature will continually seek to aggrandize and perpetuate themselves, and will seize those critical moments produced by war, invasion, or convulsion, for that purpose. It is necessary, then, that the executive magistrate [the President] should be the guardian of the people—even of the lower classes—against legislative tyranny, against the great and the wealthy, who in the course of things will necessarily compose the legislative body. Wealth tends to corrupt the mind, to nourish its love of power, and to stimulate it to oppression. History proves this to be the spirit of the opulent. * * * * The executive, [President,] therefore, ought to be so constituted as to be the great protector of the mass of the people.—Ibid., page 334.

And again:

If the legislature [Congress] have the executive [President] dependent on them, they can perpetuate and support their usurpations by the influence of tax-gatherers and other officers, by fleets, armies, &c.—Ibid., page 473.

James Madison, justly called one of "the fathers of the Constitution," also apprehended the most disastrous consequences from the exercise by Congress of any control or influence, primarily or eventually, over the appointment of President. "A powerful tendency of the legislature was to absorb all power." Mr. Madison declared—

Experience had proved a tendency in our Government to throw all power into the legislative vortex. The executives of the States are in general little more than ciphers—the legislatures omnipotent. If no effectual check be devised for restraining the instability and encroachments of the latter, a revolution of some kind or other would be inevitable. The preservation of republican government, therefore, requires some expedient for the purpose, &c.—Ibid., page 327.

Hence, Mr. Madison agreed with Mr. Wilson and others that the absolute independence and "joint weight" of the other "two departments," the executive and judiciary, were "necessary to balance the single weight of the legislature." Besides, said Mr. Madison:

Besides the general influence of that mode on the independence of the executive in the first place, the election of the chief magistrate would agitate and divide the legislature so much that the public interest would materially suffer by it. Public bodies are always apt to be thrown into contentions, but into more violent ones by such occasions than by any others. In the second place, the candidate would intrigue with the legislature—would derive his appointment from the predominant faction, and be apt to render his administration subservient to its views, &c.—Ibid., page 363.

This—

Urged Mr. Madison—

This was the real source of danger to the American Constitution.

And consequently he advocated the independence of the executive and judiciary, and the arming of them against the legislature with "every defensive authority" "consistent with republican principles."
